the incurables, are the most forlorn of all God's creatures. All the hospitals in New York and Brooklyn have this sentence printed on their circulars: "No chronic cases taken." You must die or get well. If you can't do either of these you are hustled 'o the poorhouse, which is always crowded, and probably you are compelled to lie on a mattress on the floor, and the orderlies don't forget to remind you that you are a pauper, and your associates are the dregs of humanity. Shut-ins—poor souls—struggle desperately to keep out of these homes as long as they possibly can, and nearly all have to earn their living by hook or by crook. I know one woman in Pennsylvania who hasn't had a new mattress in ten years, and the one she has is a cheap affair that is as hard as iron, and full of cruel ridges—a veritable bed of torture, and on this she lies and suffers year in and year out. LOCUST. N. C., March 20, 1907.

LOCUST, N. C., March 20, 1907.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am fourteen, have dark hair, blue eyes and am five feet tall, have a smiling face, and always ready for a joke.

Uncle Charlie, this is certainly a beautifully country. It is generally level with the exception of some hills.

We raise cotton, corn, wheat, potatoes and different varieties of fine fruits. Some of the largest strawberries in the world are grown in Eastern N. C. Our home is located in the southwestern part of N. C.

I have one sister and two brothers. My farther is a merchant.

Where the present town of Whitney now stands, two years ago there was nothing save the heavy timbered hills, known as the Yadkin banks. Whitney now has a population of two thousand or more, consisting of almost every nationality, such as Chines, Russians, Japanese, Europeans, and Italians, etc. Whitney has one of the largest electric plants of its kind in the Union.

The Gylipsie contracting company is to cut a Union.

The Gyllpsie contracting company is to cut a canal and to build the dam across the river for the sum of $7,500,000. The dam is three hundred yards long, seventy-five feet thick at the bottom, and twenty-five at the top. The first rock that was laid in constructing the dam weighed twenty tons. The canal is three miles long and walled with granife. There are several large steam shovels used that fill a car with one shovel full. Three miles down the river from the dam is a five hundred thousand horse power power house. This building is forty by eighty feet, two stories high; the walls are four feet in thickness.

two stories high; the waits are thickness.

Uncle Charlie, come down and bring the cousins, and we will go fishing on the Swanee river. There is most every kind of fish you can think of, from tadpoles up to alligators.

I must close, as it is now ten o'clock, and all is silent except the cry of the whippoorwill and the low chirrup of the Southern mocking-bird.

I remain your loving nephew and cousin.

DANIEL D. TEETER (NO. 15,662).

Daniel D. Teeter (No. 15,662).

Dan, you've written a very good letter, though I had to do quite a little fixing before it could go to print. For instance, you said you had blue eyes five feet tall, but Toby who went by special train to Locust, reported that your eyes only measured three feet from basement to roof, so I edited your letter, and made it read somewhat as I believe you intended it to. You say yours is a "beautifully" country. One more like that, and you'll have us in the Willie House. I am glad your country is on the level, and I'm surprised the hills are not level also, but such things will happen. You say your "farther" is a merchant. That is the first time I ever knew an adjective could go into business. Toby says you mean father, and are referring to a paradjective could go into business. Tooy says you mean father, and are referring to a parent, and not a distance, and a parent'ly he is correct. Now about the inhabitants of Whitney. Who in the name of all that's wonderful are the Chines. Where do they come from, and what are they like? Your fortune is made if you can catch a real live (hine and get him are the Chines. What are they like? Your fortune is made if you can catch a real live Chine and get him to the Jintown Exposition. I note you don't class Italians as Europeans, and the Black Hand Society are vowing vengeance for the way you're slighted them. Dan, you'd better get in that half a million horse power power house and hide behind those forty-eight inch walls, or you'll be dangling on the point of a stiletto. I am so busy, Dan, I can't accept your invitation to fish for fish, but Billy the Goat will come and inspect your dam site. Billy wants to see that steam shovel at work, as he'd like to make a deal with the dam contractor, and shovel those twenty tons of rocks into his interior for a couple of hours before breakfast every morning. He thinks with a foundation like that he could enjoyhis meals so much better. Maria is busy fixing Billy's supper of goat stew. It consists of shredded cans, boiled rocks, pickled glass, fried nails, hashed wire, minced rails, warmed over and served with goat butter. It is a lovely dish, and to hear it rattling against Billy's ribs as monkey want to chew his own tail off.

Eva L. Stevens, Greenville, Ala. Poor colored girl, shut-in, will be grateful for letters and cheer. Bennett Van Fossan (22), Cove, Ohio, is a terrible sufferer from heart and kidney trouble, and without means. The League has helped him a little, but further aid and kidney trouble, and without means. The League has helped him a little, but further aid is urgently needed, so he can have treatment. Elton Andrews of Circleville, Ohio, the poor boy who lost his leg, is delighted with the letters and help he has ceived from COMFORT. The nurse of the institution has banked the money sent 'im, and his prospects of getting that artificial limb are excellent. Lulu Thornburgh, Patterson, Mo., is ever so grateful for the cheer and comfort sent her. Her birthday was June 7th—better call it July 7th, and give you a chance to remember her, as I forgot it. Walter New, Webb, Miss., little boy of eight, hasn't walked in a year, would like picture postals. Miss. zubah Lee, Dunn, R. F. D., 2, N. C., is a great sufferer. Oranges are the only fruit she can eat. She will gladly pay freight if they can be sent to her in quantities. They are too expensive in her section for her to buy. Remember her. Fred W. Bizell, Newton Grove, N. C. Fred and ris uncle, Hector Bizell are both helpless from rheumatism. Help them forget their troubles. Louise J. Wise, Dillon. What is your State, you did not give it? Josie Sullivan and Carlton Honey, both sixteen, and living at Ravenden, Ark., are helpless from rheumatism. Josie has no father, brother or sisters. Both would like letters, and cheer of any kind. Mae Brown (25), Clinton, Ark. Shut-in, refined, educated girl, wants someone to help her take up a timber claim. The timber is very valuable, and it will mean independence and happiness, everything, in fact, that makes life worth living for her.

There's the list, and the rest is up to you. Do your best, angels can do no more.

Lovingly yours.

Anxious to divert his thoughts, she put into his hand a bunch of orange flowers and violets, which had been sent to her that day by Mr. Manning; and taking a book from the bed, she resumed the reading of "The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain," to which the invalid had never wearied of listening.

While she was standing before a table, preparing some nourishment to be given to him during the night, Mrs. Andrews came close to her, and whispered:

"Do you see much change? Is he really worse, or do my fears magnify every bad symptom?"

Comfort's League of Cousins.

For the information of those who have not been regular readers of Combort, and others who are becoming interested in the Cousins' League for the first time, and are ignorant of its aim and objects, the following facts will be of interest:

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of Combort's immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinhing and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of Combort's family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to transcribing the older folks are admitted, the youn folks will always be the first consideration, and Uncle Charlie will write his page with a view of entertaining our young people solely.

Though the older folks are admitted, the young folks will always be the first consideration, and uncle charlie will write his page with a view of entertaining our young people solely.

Those who wish to join our League can do so by subscribing to Combort for one year or inducing some one else to subscribe, and sending us their subscription. No premiums will be given those sending in members for the League.

If you are already a subscriber you can join by renewing your subscription, or subscribing and the Comport to a friend, if you already take the paper. All who join the League will receive a button and a handsome certificate of membership, alse Comport for one year, and the privilege of having their names in the letter list.

"Edna, I have been a trouble to you for a long time, but you will miss me when I am gone, and you will have nothing to love. If you live long, marry Mr. Manning, and let him take care of you. Don't work so hard, dear Edna; only rest, and let him make you happy. Before I knew you I was always wishing to die; but now I hate to leave you all alone, my own dear, pale Edna."

"Oh Felix darling! hush! Go to sleep You."

"Oh, Felix, darling! hush! Go to sleep. You wring my heart!"
Her sobs distressed him, and, feebly patting her cheek, he said:
"Perhaps if you will sing me something low, I may go to sleep, and I want to hear your voice once more. Sing me that song about the child and the rose-bush, that Hattle likes so much."
"Not that! anything but that! It is too sad, my precious little darling."
"But I want to hear it; please, Edna."
Tears rolled over her face as she chanted the verses; and when she concluded, he repeated very faintly:
"Sweetly it rests. and on dream-wings flies.

"Sweetly it rests, and on dream-wings flies, To play with the angels in paradise!"

He nestled his lips to hers, and, after a little

He nestled his lips to hers, and, after a little while, murmured:

"Good night, Edna!"

"Good night, my darling!"

She gave him a stimulating potion, and arranged his head comfortably. Ere long his heavy breathing told her that he slept, and, stealing from his side, she sat down in a large chair near the head of his bed, and watched him. For many months he had been failing, and they had traveled from place to place, hoping against hope that each change would certainly be beneficial.

For many months he had been failing, and they had traveled from place to place, hoping against hope that each change would certainly be beneficial.

Day and night Edna had nursed him, had devoted every thought, almost every prayer to him; and now her heart seemed centered in him. She had ceased to study aught but his comfort and happiness, had written nothing save letters to friends; and notwithstanding her anxiety concerning the cripple, the frequent change of air had surprisingly improved her own health. For six months she had escaped the attacks so much dreaded, and began to believe her restoration complete, though the long banished color obstinately refused to return to her face, which seemed unable to recover its rounded outline.

She knew that his life was flickering out gently but surely; and now, as she watched the pale, pinched features, her own quivered, and she classed her hands and wept, and stifled a groan. She had prayed so passionately and continually that he might be spared to her; but it seemed that whenever her heart-strings wrapped themselves around an idol, a jealous God tore them loose, and snatched away the dear object, and left the heart to bleed. If that boy died, how utterly desolate and lonely she would be; nothing left to care for and to cling to, nothing to claim as her own, and anoint with the tender love of her warm heart.

She had been so intensely interested in the expansion of his mind, had striven so tirelessly to stimulate his brain, and soften and purify his heart; she had been so proud of his rapid progress, and so ambitious for his future, and now the mildew of death was falling on her fond hopes. Ah! she had been so proud of his rapid progress, and so ambitious for his future, and now the mildew of death was falling on her fond hopes. Ah! she had berne patiently many trials, but this appeared unendurable. She had set all her earthly happiness on a little thing—the life of a helpless cripple; and as she gazed through her tears at that shrunken, sallow face, and the render p those bread-riots of the heart are fearful things, and crucified consciences too often mark their track.

The little figure on the bed was so motionless that Edna crept nearer and leaned down to listen to the breathing; and her tears fell on his thick, curling hair, and upon the orangeblossoms and violets.

Standing there she threw up her clenched hands and prayed sobbingly:

"My father! spare the boy to me! I will dedicate anew my life and his to thy work! I will make him a minister of thy word, and he shall save precious souls. Oh! do not take him away! If not for a lifetime, at least spare him a few years! Even one more year, O my God!"

She walked to the window, rested her forehead against the stone facing, and looked out; and the wonderful witchery of the solemn night wove its spell around her. Great, golden stars clustered in the clear heavens, and were reflected in the caim, blue pavement of the Mediterranean, where not a ripple shivered their shining images.

From some lofty campanile, in a distant section of the silent city, sounded the angelus bell; and from the deep shadow of olive, vine, and myrtie that clothed the amphitheatre of hills, the convent bells caught and reechoed it.

"Nsture comes sometimes,
And says, 'I am ambassador for God!"

"Nature comes sometimes, And says, 'I am ambassador for God;'"

But though the large, black eyes opened when she raised his head, there was no recognition in their fixed gaze; for the soul was preparing for its final flight, and was too busy to look out of she raised his head, there was no recognition in their fixed gaze; for the soul was preparing for its final flight, and was too busy to look out of its windows.

In vain they resorted to the most powerful restoratives; he remained in the heavy stupor, with no sign of animation, save the low irregular breath, and the weak flutter of the thread-like pulse.

Mrs. Andrews wept aloud and wrung her hands, and Hattle cried passionately, as she stood at the side of her brother's bed; but there were no tears on Edna's cold, gray face. She had spent them all at the foot of God's throne; and now that He had seen fit to deny her petition, she silently looked with dry eyes at the heavy rod that smote her.

The night waned, the life with it; now and then the breathing seemed to cease, but after a few seconds a faint gasp told that the clay would not yet forego its hold on the soul that struggled to be free.

The poor mother seemed almost beside herself, as she called on her child to speak to her once more.

"Sing something, Edna; oh! perhaps he will hear! It might rouse him!"

The orphan shook her head, and dropped her face on his.

"He would not hear me; no, no! He is listening to the song of those, whose golden harps ring in the New Jerusalem."

Out of the whitening east rose the new day, radiant in bridal garments, wearing a star on its pearly brow; and the sky flushed, and the sea glowed, while silvery mists rolled up from the purple mountain gorges, and rested awhile on the summits of the Apennines, and sunshine streamed over the world once more.

The first rays flashed into the room, kissing the withered flowers on the bosom of the cripple, and falling warm and bright on the cold eyellds and the pulseless temples. Edna's hand was pressed to his heart, and she knew that it had given its last weary throb; knew that Felix Andrews had crossed the sea of glaas, and in the dawn of the Eternal day wore the promised morning-star, and stood in peace before the Sun of Righteousness.

At last with a terrible oath, the crook managed to wrest himself free, and throwing the whole weight of his body against Peter, threw him to the floor, then with a leap that was astounding, he went through the door and into the street, closely followed by Crit.

Ralph felt that Crit was capable of taking care of Hollis, and so he bent over Peter. For an instant the boy was stunned, then he leaped to his feet, looking wildly about.

"Is he gone?" the lad asked, his lips quivering.

"Crit went right after him," Ralph said consolingly.

Peter looked as though he had been detected in the commission of a crime, although he knew he had done all that was possible, and slowly turned toward the handcuffed prisoners.

"The other fellow, Ferris is not here, he is over on State street," giving the number of the hotel in which he was incarcerated, and upon the request of the chief, Peter took a couple of officers with him and went after the crook. It was not difficult to induce the clerk to open the door with his duplicate key, for he was terrified at the sight of the officers, and when they entered the room, they found Ferris sleeping, his face red, his breathing stentorious, his appearance repulsive.

"What's the matter with him?" asked the cler.

"What's the matter water and clera.

"Nothing but a little morphine," Peter said abruptly, snapping on the handcuffs.

When he returned with his prisoner, he found a wagon before the door, filled with officers and the two crooks who had been captured. To them Ferris was added, and then the chief said slowly:

"This has been wonderful work, but I am sorry 'Four-time' escaped."
"Oh, he hasn't." Ralph said cheerfully. "Mr. Truman was at his heels, and he won't come back without his man."

back without his man."

"Sure?"

"Absolutely sure," was Ralph's quick reply.

"He may escape."

"Not this time," and the chief shaking his head in admiration felt that there was not much chance for the crook, although he realized what a desperate man he was.

"Better guard these men pretty well," Ralph advised, and the chief said savagely:

"Don't fear. We've had just about as much as we can stand from these men. I can't see though how it is that my men never came within smelling distance of them, and Mr. Truman routed them at once. Wonderful man that!" and as the chief left them, Ralph and Peter agreed to his statement, but they wished with all their hearts they knew where Crit was and how he was faring.

"It isn't as though he knew the town," Peter grumbled.

grumbled.
"Crit knows every town he gets into by instinct," Ralph said reassuringly.
"I hope so, but I'd like to be by his side," Peter said remorsefully.
"Wouldn't 1?" Ralph returned sharply, as they entered their headquarters.

A RACE FOR A HUMAN LIFE. The Man with Many Aliases darted away into

The Man with Many Aliases darted away into the night.

Crit followed, his quick ear distinguishing the footsteps of the crook from those of the other passerby. Not every man, even along Twenty-second street, has worn irons and learned to walk lock step. Hollis had done both, and to an experienced man like Crit, these facts were plainly distinguishing marks.

The man ran as though on a mile track, doubling, dodging, using all the feints his long criminal life had taught him, but in vain. On his track was one who was relentless as a bloodhound: as faithful as one of those animals and as hard to deceive.

The pace was telling upon the crook, and on Crit as well, for although the detective was usually good for almost any length of time, he had passed through so much since he had stepped from the Pullman that morning, that any other man would have been exhausted, without further effort.

At last, panting like some wild animal, Hollis darted into a little cellarway, down a pair of rotten stairs, and Crit, never pausing, followed him.

rotten stairs, and Crit, never pausing, followed him.

As Crit entered the room, a door just swinging to showed the direction he had taken. Crit passed through it into one of those opium dens so numerous on South Clark street. Hollis looked back, and seeing Crit, made a spring forward. The two men collided, Crit gave a stinging blow, and received one, and both men let go their holds, the next minute Hollis darted again into the street, with Crit a close second. The proprietor of the opium den gazed after them, then shaking his head, picked up a handkerchief Crit had dropped as well as a roll of bills lost by the crook, and with a smile on his stolid face, resumed his work of sorting laundry in front.

People turned and stared after the two men, but no one interfered. The district was too unsavory for anyone to care to get between desperate men. No one seeing the two could doubt that.

The Wentworth avenue cars clanged by, and some of the passengers saw two men, both bareheaded dash along, and wondered, and forgot. Such strange things happen on South Clark such strange things happen on south clark street.

Suddenly, Hollis grabbed a passing car, and stumbled on it. He was half a dozen rods ahead of Crit. The latter saw his man thus escaping, and gathering all his strength spurted ahead, took a flying leap, and landed on the coupling gear, from which he leaped to the platform.

Hollis, who had dropped, utterly spent, into a coupling gear, from which he leaped to the platform.

Hollis, who had dropped, utterly spent, into a seat, saw him. He did not stop to ask his intentions, but bolted through the car, and leaped off the platform, out into the night, closely followed by Crit, and the two men were swallowed up in the surrounding darkness, for lamp posts were few and dimly burning.

While this exciting chase was going on, Percy Mandeville was vainly endeavoring to explain how it was that he was to be found in the retreat of the gang in the Ghetto, to which Peter had directed the chief and his men.

The young man who had once enjoyed the confidence of his employers, and been a welcome addition to many brilliant social events, had at last to confess that he was guilty of many thefts, and was held by the chief, pending the arrival of the proper officer with necessary papers.

"If the Trumans would only stay here a short time longer," the chief thought to himself, "Chicago would be the Garden Spot of the World. They'd sweep it clean of every crook; but then New York isn't swept clean, and they live there," and this consoled him a little.

No, the Trumans cannot purge any place of criminals, but they do their part, that is cer-

No, the Trumans cannot purge any place of criminals, but they do their part, that is certain.

Sylvia Lyster was taken from the terrible place in which she had been lodged by Hollis, and restored to Mrs. Haddam, by whom she was guarded until once again she was in her father's arms, and by him told the true story of her birth. After she knew that she was really Sylvia Lyster, she was very glad to turn to the man who loved her, and of whom she had thought so long and tenderly, while in captivity. In the meanwhile Ralph and Peter waited and agonized. Ralph whiled away some of the time by making a careful report of the case in his notebook, but Peter could not keep quiet. At last he said hastily:

"Ralph, let's go out on a still hunt."

"Crit may turn up," Ralph objected.

"We can leave a note for him," Peter declared, and at last Ralph assented, for he was very uneasy. They both knew how exhausted Crit was with his terrible experiences, and feared for him.

"I know that guy's strength," Peter said ruefully. There was a lump on the back of his head as large as a small egg, which was very painful.

They had no idea where to search, but they head as large as a small egg, which was very painful.

They had no idea where to search, but they kept a sharp lookout for signs. Suddenly Ralph gave a cry. On the corner of a building was a small mark. The detective recognized it.

After that, here and there they found one of these marks, very far apart and badly made when seen, as though by one in passing.

"Crit's been running," Ralph said decidedly, and Peter nodded sagely.

Their pursuit led them into strange places. They searched the opium den, thoroughly scaring the proprietor out of his wits, for he was afraid that they had come after the bills and handkerchief.

When he found it was two men they were after, he actually became communicative, and nodded vigorously when Ralph asked:

"Did you see two men tonight chasing each other?"

"Where are they?" was the next question.

"Where are they?" was the next question.
"Me no know." Peter cried threateningly.
"No no, me no know," the fellow repeated.
"Where did they go?" kalpla asked, having convinced himself that neither Crit nor Hollis were there.

"Me no know. Man' mi n. Nother man lun in. Two man dightee. Two man lun out. Me me tives could not induce him to budge.
"Intelligent," Peter grumbled, but Ralph sald nothing.

Just after they left the den, they came across another mark, and following this stini another. For some time.

When Crit bounded from the moving car after the man he was chasing, a singular thing happened. As the car was moving, he had been-carried ahead of the crook. In order to counter a carried ahead of the crook. In order to counter a carried ahead of the crook. In order to counter a carried ahead of the crook. In order to counter a carried ahead of the crook. Hollis showed the yellow streak and screamed

Hollis showed the yellow streak and screamed like a woman.

"Stop kicking, and I will try and save us both." Crit said grimly, knowing that now, if never before, was the time to exert that marvelous strength of his.

When the elevator had reached the top of the wall, the other side had gone down, and before it reached the ground, Ralph and Peter sprung on it, crying:

"Holst us, quick!"

As Crit hung there in his perilous position, their heads just showed above the wall, and they were frantically beseeching the man operating the elevators to hurry.

Concentrating all of his strength and his mind upon his task Crit Truman performed his most wonderful feat, for through sheer muscular strength, he slowly, yet steadily muscled out the dangling man, and with that arm held rigid, drew himself upward.

The work had all stopped, and the men were gazing breathless, on what was the most wonderful thing they had ever witnessed.

With his muscles standing out like great cables, Crit held his arm steady, and drew himself up, until, wonderful as this may seem, he was able to sit upon the broad cross beam, and just at that moment, a pair of strong hands supported him, while another pair relieved his arm of its awful strain. Crit smiled as he looked into the faces of his assistants, then he said:

"No, don't unlock those bracelets. Hollis has fainted, but I want to keep him close to me until I deliver him to the proper authorities."

Jim Hollis, The Man with Many Aliases has paid his debt to society, and Crit no longer feels any effect of the terrible strain he placed upon himself, but the chief of police still faces many problems in his effort to clear out the Levee, and drive from his city the many criminals which congregate in the notorious districts of that metropolis.

EPILOGUE.

"And you could think, darling, that my love would be influenced by any such trifling thing?" cried a manly voice, as a pair of strong arms closed about Sylvia Lyster.

"The terrible, bitter shame!" Sylvia sobbed, her head lying against his bosom.

"My precious little one! It is terrible, but all is over now," and Custer Quex pressed his lips to those of the woman he loved so tenderly. "Yes, all over, and yet I cannot help remembering," and she shuddered.

"Marry me, swectheart, right away, and I'll try and drive all recollections from your dear heart," came the tender whisper, and blushing divinely, Sylvia consented.

As she sat, her lover's arm about her, planning a happy future, she suddenly cried:

"But Custer, we mustn't forget Kathie," and he replied with a tender kiss:

"No, sweetheart, we will not forget Kathie or anyone whom you love."

"It was that rascally Indian," said the lawyer suddenly.
"Is the Indian here?" asked Mehitable, showing a disposition to fly. "I don't dare to stay. I shall be carried off and made to marry one of the copper-colored wretches. Oh, oh, I know I shall."

"I don't think you need be alarmed on that score," said Clarke, a little dryly. "Besides there are none near. It was only one that overpowered me, and he would not have succeeded if he had not taken me unexpectedly. It was the rascal who goes by the name of It was the rascal who goes by the name of Indian John."

Mehitable stooped down, and with the coy look of a young girl essayed to unloose the fastenings. But on a sudden, when she had about half completed her task, she stopped short, and looked unutterably bashful. "What's the matter? Can't you untie it?" asked Clarke.

"It wasn't that," said Mehitable.

"What was it, then? I wish you'd be kind enough to make haste, for it is rather painful, feeling the strain of these cords."

"I—I was thinking that we are alone," said Mehitable, bashfully.

"I—I was thinking that we are alone," said Mehitable, bashfully.

"And suppose we are—what then?" inquired Clarke, in great surprise.

"I was thinking that if I untied you—you might go and—and—being a great deal stronger than I am—might go and kiss me, and I couldn't help myself."

"Can anything exceed the folly of this ridiculous old maid?" thought Clarke, impatiently. "I must even humor her folly."

"But I promise you on my honor," he said emphatically, "that you have nothing to fear from me."

Mehitable would have been better pleased

Mehitable would have been better pleased with some gallant demonstration, but was determined not to yield the point yet.

"And you'll excuse me for calling you dear Mr. Clarke?" she said, veiling her face with her handkerchief.

"I didn't hear you call me so."

"But I did," said Mehitable candidly. "It was in the surprise of first beholding you in this distressed condition that I addressed you was in the surprise of first beholding you in this distressed condition that I addressed you in that manner—you won't take advantage of it, will you, Mr. Clarke?"

The lawyer assured her very emphatically that she had nothing whatever to fear from him, and urged her to complete the work of his deliverence.

his deliverance. This she at length did, but while doing so favored him with some reminiscences of the lover whom she had rejected, and who in consequence, as she darkly intimated, had found existence to grine or the state of the existence too grievous a burden to bear.

"Then why didn't you marry him?" Clarke, bluntly. "Because I could not give him the trusting affections of my young and unsophisticated heart," said Mehitable sentimentally. "I have since seen one—who I think I might learn to love."

'Indeed, who is it?" "Indeed, who is it?"
"Do not ask me, Mr. Clarke. It is a secret which I can never speak to the ear of anyone —least of all to you."
"And why not to me?" demanded the law-

"And why not to me?" demanded the law-yer.
"Because—oh, Mr. Clarke, do not ask me any more questions, for I might reveal the state of my heart, and indeed I must not."
"Zounds, if I don't believe she's in love with me," said Clarke to himself. "In that case I certainly won't press the old girl to make what might prove to be rather an awkward reve-lation."

"Won't you come to the house?" asked Mehitable.

"Won't you come to the house?" asked Mehitable.

"Thank you," said Clarke, "I shall not trouble to do so just now. I must follow on the track of the confounded Indian who has served me such a miserable trick."

"Oh, don't!" exclaimed Mehitable, clasping her hands. "For my sake. don't! He will kill and scalp you, and I—we all should miss you so much."

"Thank you," said Clarke, slightly smiling, "but I apprehend no danger—I shall now be on my guard. I am much obliged to you for acting as my deliverer, and must now bid you good morning."

"I wonder if he loves me!" thought the spinster. "What a beautiful man he is! I don't know but it is my duty to marry him if he asks me. If I can see that it is my duty, I will submit without a murmur."

Meanwhile Dick Clarke searched until he found the pocketbook laying in the path. There were no papers to be seen, Jerry having carried away the whole.

"The Indian has undoubtedly destroyed them," thought Clarke. "In that case, matters are not so bad as they might be."

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month,

UNE has gone, my dears, and July is with us. June wasn't altogether the month of roses, but I guess none of you froze to death. But the summer is with us, and whether cold or warm, it is the sunny time of the year, and we must shine with the sun and not let the frost get into our systems and chill the good that is in us. I hope those of you who can go away for into our systems and chill the good that is in us. I hope those of you who can go away for the summer will have a lovely time, and that those who have to stay will not be very unhappy. Just now here is work to do, though, and I mustn't be talking to you, even though it is to wish you every blessing.

it is to wish you every blessing.

The first letter I open is from Worryful Heart, Scribner, Neb., and she asks the old, old question of what to do to make the man care for her who does not care. Isn't it strange that girls never will learn that such efforts are useless? Love goeth where it listeth, and no earthly power can make it go elsewhere. If he doesn't care for you, dear, he cannot, and you might as well find someone who can. There is no other way, and you waste time looking for one. You blush when his name is spoken because you are in love with him. Why should you let yourself be, when he doesn't want you? Orange Blooms, Greenville, Ala.—Marry the man who loves you and wants you to be his wife. Why do you want to be so silly as to wait for the man who doesn't love you to see if he won't by and by? Really, you don't deserve as good a man as the one who wants to marry you.

you.

Scarlet Rose, Medaryville, Ind.—Seeing that the young man to whom you were engaged went off and married another girl without a word to you about it, perhaps the best thing you could do with his presents and his letters would be to send them to the lady who is now his wife. This isn't quite the Christian way, but some men don't deserve Christian treatment.

don't deserve Christian treatment.

Blue-eyed Bertha, Mission City, Tex.—It is all right to write to "good old Tom" and straighten out any misunderstanding which may exist through some fault of yours. Silly girls don't settle their difficulties that way, but sweet and sensible ones do. And ask him to spend the day of your birthday with you, too. If he's all right, he'll do it.

day of your birthday with you, too. If he's all right, he'll do it.

Blue-eyed Belle, Lucien, Miss.—The first thing a girl of fifteen should do with reference to the young men is to obey her Larents. Any young man who attempts to persuade her otherwise does not care what harm happens to her.

Perplexed, Portage, O.—By all means advise your friend against the young man who treated you so meanly. He is dishonorable in his conduct and he lies to the girls to whom he is attentive. Maybe she won't believe you—girls are queer that way sometimes—but tell her anyhow. (2) Better wait two years instead of two months before permitting your friend's discarded sweetheart to make love to you. He would drop you in a minute at a sign from the old one. Would you like that? Reconcile them if you can. (3) If you think it is quite the proper thing to kiss the young man good night, go ahead. And, as it is the proper thing, why not tell everybody that you kiss him? Surely one should not be ashamed to tell of the proper things one does.

Puzzled Beauty, Farwell, Minn.—The engagement ring is given by the man to the maid, though there is no law against her giving him one if she wants to. Do as you talked to one if she wants isn't the custom.

Blue Eyes, Farrier, Okla.—As you talked to the young man at the house of a friend, though you were not introduced, it would be quite proper to speak to him afterwards. At the same time, you need not unless you wished, and he has no right to be offended if you do not. But such formality is disagreeable. (2) Indeed, my dear, I don't know how a young man acts towards a young lady if he wishes to keep company with her. They all act so different. But it is very plain to the lady unless she is stupid, which you are not, I am sure, from your letter.

Ky. Maid, Denton, Ky.—Yes, I do think it wrong for second cousins to marry. Go out of the family to marry. (2) A paid companion may have various duties, depending entirely upon what her employer wishes her to do.

Sad Sweetheart, Marion, Ind.—He couldn't upon what her employer wishes her to do.

Sad Sweetheart, Marion, Ind.—He couldn't have loved you very passionately or he would have sent you' a Christmas present when you had sent him one. (2) Jealousy is no sign of love. Not ugly jealousy, anyway. Better have no sweetheart than have one who is meanly jealous. (3) Kissing games are vulgar, and never seen in good society.

Three Sisters, Virgilina, Va.—She may visit the young man's home as the guest of his parents, or sisters, even though no young people are in the house. (2) Don't have a sweetheart who is jealous of his brother. That is a little too mean for anything. (3) The best way for a girl to attract the attention of men is not to try to.

Blue Eyes, Brinckerhoff, N. V.—For goodness.

Blue Eyes, Brinckerhoff, N. Y.—For goodness' sake don't part with a nice man like he is, just because your parents want you to. Wait until you are twenty-one and marry him. You'll be the better for the waiting and so will your parents, and everybody will be happy.

ents, and everybody will be happy.

Brownie, Blackburn, Ark.—Break the engagement and tell him why, because you will be as cowardly as he is if you do not. You cannot marry him feeling as you do, and you can't lie to him, can you? Have a talk with his mother.

N. T., Argentine, Kans.—As you were at fault in the beginning it is your place to make the first move towards a settlement. You were only careless, and he should forgive you.

Makel, Canton, O.—Of course he cares for Mabel Canton, O.—Of course he cares for you. Why should he "seek you farther"? He has shown signs enough, now you show one by asking him to call on you and be as nice to him as you can without over-doing it. Why shouldn't you visit his sister? My, Mabel, but you are young in such matters.

Sad Girl, Spokane, Wash.—Ask your mother, A fifteen-year-old girl's best friend is her mother, or ought to be.

Anxious Jane, Ferndale, Tenn.—Treat him only as a friend, and if you see any other man who interests you accept his attention. This man evidently doesn't care to be more than friendly. As he has not shown any desire to be other than that, don't you.

Troubled Cousin, Noble, Ill.—If he will agree to kiss you not oftener than once a week, you might yield that much to this great love you have for him. But make him promise solemnly, and then see how quick he will break his promise after you have let him kiss you once. Go on, it's you he is kissing, not me.

Cheyenne, Paxton, Neb.—How could he care for you and pay all his attention to the other and the court of the surprise that the girl whenever she was around? (2) You wear an engagement ring as long as the engagement lasts, however long that may be.

all sats, however long that may be.

Troubled Heart, Mason, Tex.—You cannot win him. Read other answers in this column to others troubled as you are. Why, oh, why, do so many girls want the impossible?

Troubled Brown Eyes, Marshfield, Mo.—When you don't know which of two men you ought to marry, you ought not marry either. Better wait till you see if the astrologer wasn't right.

(2) Thank him and tell him pleasantly yes or no, when he asks you to go anywhere with him. The latest manner is the same as the old one.

(3) Ask him to call again. Don't wait for him to ask if he may. Your beau ought to come back without asking.

Blue-eyed Minnie, Albany, Ill.—I hardly back without asking.

Blue-eyed Minnie, Albany, Ill.—I hardly think he could love you more than his life, and stop calling on you as soon as you had promised to be his wife. Something is wrong with him, and you should drop him, unless he can explain.

Anxious Darling, Farmington, Mo.—If he makes love to you and goes with another girl, it is time for you to send back his letters and presents and go with somebody else. No kissing until you are engaged.

Anxious Girl, Cloverport, Ky.—Don't, wait

Anxious Girl, Cloverport, Ky.—Don't wait till he has gone too far if you do not intend to accept him. It is not fair to either of you, and I do not think you are inclined to be a fiirt. As you are older than he is you should add that to the other excuse that you do not love him. At his age, he will outgrow the shock. If you love him, marry him.

P. E. W., Lascassas, Tenn.—Give him up. You are not suited to each other at all. (2) Yes, you may give small presents to your men friends. (3) Well, I am not sure, but perhaps you might kiss your sweetheart good by, when he is going away for a year, even though you are not engaged.

Rosa, Bevier, Mo.—You can't get him back if he doesn't want to come. (2) No. (3) Ask a caller to call again if you want him to call. And don't if you don't.

Anxious Girl, Faceville, Ga.—As he has proposed once, it seems to me that you could easily tell him that your feelings have changed and he should try again. Talk to him gently on the subject and see what he has to say.

on the subject and see what he has to say.

Little Rose, Starkville, Miss.—As it was not your fault at all, and he is to blame if anyone is, pay no more attention to the matter, or to him. Be polite to him and no more.

Blue-eyed Marie, Seaton, Ill.—Wait until he comes to see you. If he loves you still, he will tell you so and ask you the question you are waiting for. But he never will ask it, if you try to coax him to do so. Some men are very bashful about writing what they think. (2) Don't write with a pencil.

There, dears, your questions are answered, and let us all hope they are answers that will do the very greatest good. I even like to scold you when I think it will make better girls of you, and better women, by and by. Now may the good Lord watch over us all till we meet again. By, by, Cousin Marion.

broken up on her, and I don't approve of it in the least. I had the scare of my life for fear I should lose her last summer. A famous prima donna spent the summer here recuperating. She heard Theta sing in the choir and went wild over her voice, said her lower notes were the sweetest she had ever heard, and tried every means of persuasion to induce Theta to study for an operatic career. To my relief Theta told her she was happy where she was, and that she had no craving for ambition's sake. The singer gave up at last and admitted it would be best for the little wild rose to remain in its woodland setting, that if transplanted to a hothouse it might lose its sweetness. I like the wild rose best. It is not so perfect in form and its perfume is not so intense, but it blooms on the desert's plain where the hothouse blossom would wither and die. The wild rose has all the strength of the wilderness. Am I a selfish old woman, laddie, to want to keep all its sweetness for myself? At least I don't want it transplanted to any doctor's office. Maggie is bringing in the popcorn, so refreshments are in order, and I will bring my letter to a close. Write by return post and let us know about the baby.

"With love and best wishes, your mother, "ELLEN WARFIELD."

As Gene reached the closing portion of the letter a keen pang shot through his heart. He had never thought of Theta as being anything but faithful to himself—(a man always likes to fancy a woman as cherishing his memory)— but faithful to himself—(a man always likes to fancy a woman as cherishing his memory)— it was a rude shock to him that others should consider her in the light in which he had once looked upon her.

"Could it have been only a hallucination "Could it have been only a hallucination conjured up by my fevered brain—my seeing her there in the waters at Niagara?" he thought. "So she would not study for a musical career—she cares nothing for ambition. Ah! little girl, you were wiser than I. O God—see what my insatiable ambition has brought to me! At home, they are happy—mother, Uncle John, Theta—they do not miss me—but I—I am desolate." A mist came over his eyes. The child sti. ed and wailed out its incessant cry: out its incessant cry:
"Mamma, mamma!"
Gene laid its little face to his.

"No, darling, you have no mamma—you precious, for in all the world he has no one but you."

DEAR SISTERS: I have been a shut-in for over a year and only God knows how I have suffered. I have an exophthalmic goitre, and also heart and nervous troubles

The doctor considers my goitre incurable, but aybe some sister may know of something

The doctor considers my goire incurable, our maybe some sister may know of something which might give me relief.

Those suffering with gallstones try taking a small wineglassful of olive oil twice a day. I would appreciate any kind of flower seeds as I would like to have a Comfort flower bed. I hope to hear from some of the sisters soon.

FIVE SOUVENIR POST-CARDS

The beautiful cards we offer you are among the very finest ever produced. Not only are they fine specimens of the printer's art, but we have selected them from copyrighted subjects which are not easily obtained elsewhere. We have, however, made arrangements to supply our friends with a set of five. They will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, free to all who take advantage of our offer. We want to introduce our new paper THE AMERICAN FARM WORLD into homes where it is not now taken. THE AMERICAN FARM WORLD in a large monthly publication of from 20 to 32 large pages filled to overflowing with original matter that the Farmer, Gardener, Poultryman, and in fact any man or woman, even though he or she have but a small flower-garden, ought to know. It contains helpful departments for every member of the household. The regular subscription-price is only 15 cents a year, or five years for 50 cents. It is unusual for us to accept subscriptions for a shorter time than one year, but to give all the opportunity to get acquainted with it before subscribing for a longer time we make the following most liberal offer: Send us Ten Cents and we will send you THE AMERICAN FARM WORLD three months, together with Five Beautiful Post-Cards.

A POST-GARD ALBUM FREE If you will send us a club of ten trial three-month subscriptions at our trial-subscription-price of ten cents each, we will send you ten sets of Postal Cards, five cards in each set to deliver to each subscriber; and, to reward you for your time in securing the subscriptions, we will send to you, absolutely free and post-paid, by mail, a beautifully decorated Post-Card Album in cloth binding. It will hold one hundred cards.

In this department will be carefully any be submitted. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending fifteen (15) cents, in sileer or stamps, for an annual subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advices, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S HOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

W L. B.—Under the laws of the State from which you write, we are of the opinion, that upon the death of your wife, leaving no will, her estate, both real and personal, would descend in equal parise to her children, or their descendants, except that you would be entitled to a child's share in her personal property. If she held the property you mention as a trustee for you and was not its real owner, we think the only way for you to get title would be by bringing an equity action to establish your title to the property. Such an action would be quite expensive and might prove troublesome for you to substantiate in case any of your children should contest your right to the property. If your only desire is, as you state, to see that all of your children share equally, we fail to see the necessity of such an action, as you yourself are the only sufferer under the present conditions, but if there is danger that any of your children might try to make trouble for you in connection with the property, you should prosecute your action at once.

Mrs. A. C. E.—Under the laws of the State from which should prosecute your action at once.

Mrs. A. C. E.—Under the laws of the State from which you write, we are of the opinion, that upon the death of your father, leaving no will, the homestead property would become the absolute property of his widow and children, one half in value to the widow and the other half to the children. We think, however, that before dividing his property you should ascertain to a certainty that he is dead. After you have obtained positive proof of this she can proceed to sell the property, all the heirs joining with her in the deed.

J. L. We are of the original that upon the property are the can be can proceed to sell the property.

J. L.—We are of the opinion, that a license is not neces-sary for you to sell the article you mention, in the manner you state.

J. 1.—We are of the opinion, that a license is not necessary for you to sell the article you mention, in the manner you state.

Mrs. G. R.—Under the laws of the State you mention we are of the opinion, that the property both real and personal of an intestate (person leaving no will) descends and is distributed as follows:—(1) to the children and their descendants equally, the children of a deceased child or grandchild taking the share of their parents in equal shares; (2) where there is no child, nor descendant of a child, and no widow or surviving husband, then to the parents, brothers and sisters and their descendants equally, when only one parent, he or she takes a 'double portion; and if there is no parent living, then to the brothers and sisters and their descendants; (3) when there is a widow or surviving husband, and no child or descendant of a child, one half of the real estate and the whole of the personal estate goes to the widow or surviving husband absolutely, and the other half of the real estate descends as in other cases where there are no children or descendants of children; (4) where there is a widow or surviving husband, and also a child or descendants of a child, and no parent, brother, or sister, or descendant of a child, and no parent, brother, or sister, or descendant of a parent, brother or sister and no widow or surviving husband, the estate descends in equal parts to the next of kin in equal degree, there being no representative among collaterals, except with descendants of a brothers or sisters, and no distinction being made between kindred of the half and the whole blood; (6) in case of a widow or, surviving husband, and no kindred, the whole estate goes to the widow or surviving husband, and no kindred, the whole estate goes to the widow or surviving husband, and no kindred, the whole estate goes to the widow or surviving husband, and no kindred, the whole estate goes to the widow or surviving husband, the case of a widow or, surviving husband, or kindred, the conditions which might

M. E. G.—Communicate with the Bureau of free lands, Washington, D. C.

J. S.—Either there must be some error, or you in some way have failed to live up to your contract as the United States Government does not confiscate property except for just cause.

G. S.—The papers you send us show nothing except what the Company you mention represent in regard to their stock. An examination of the charter under which they operate would be necessary to show what they have power to do.

L. U. S.—We are of the opinion that a city government has power to condemn property for the purpose you mention. If your property was taken without due process of law, your remedy would be an action for damages against the City Government.

Mrs. J. O. S.—Under the laws of the State from which you write, we are of the opinion, that if a husband by his will deprives his wife of over one half of his property, she shall be allowed either to accept the conditions of the will or one half of the property, as she sees fit.

will or one half of the property, as she sees fit.

F. W.—We are of the opinion that, although under the laws of the State from which you write a seal is not absolutely essential to the validity, nevertheless one should be ptaced on the paper immediately after the signature of the testator. Such seals can be purchased at almost any stationery store. The will should be signed in your State by at least two witnesses. We think that if you are not familiar with the form and manner of execution of wills you would do well to have a lawyer draw and attend to the execution of your will, as it is rather technical work and you cannot be too careful in avoiding mistakes.

W. H. G.—We think you should write to the Superin-

W. H. G.—We think you should write to the Superintendent of Insurance of the State in which your policies were written. If you have fully complied with all the terms of your policy, and your loss was such a one as was covered by your insurance, we see no reason why you cannot enforce its payment, provided, of course, the company is solvent and you have not in any way waived the payment of your claim. We have no knowledge of the financial condition of the Company you mention.

W. R. B.—While, in our opinion, the law is not very well settled in the State you mention, in regard to the question you submit. we think you might be enjoined from committing the act you propose and sued for dam-ages, or proceeded against in some manner.

ages, or proceeded against in some manner.

M. E. L.—We are of the opinion that, under the laws of the State from which you write, (1) if your mother died without leaving a will her real estate descended in equal shares to her children, subject, however, to the right of your father to dower of an estate for life in one third of all her real estate; that if the advances he made to your mother, with which to make improvements on the property, were presents to her he has no claim for the money, but that if he did not make her a present of the money his relimbursement should come by way of a claim against her estate; (2) the source from which he derived his income makes no difference; (3) that you-can take your own property away with you, if you so desire; (4) that at your age your father could not be held for your hydrician's bill unless he contracted for the services or agreed to pay for them.

G. F.—We are of the opinion, that the policy you mention agreed to pay for them.

G. F.—We are of the opinion, that the policy you mention will be payable at maturity to the beneficiary as named therein, unless changed or assigned before maturity, in which event it will be paid as provided for by such change or assignment. The beneficiary as named in your statement to us seems to be very plain and we fail to see why you cannot understand it. You might communicate with the Company for information in regard to any changes.

M. T.—We do not think that, under the circumstances you mention, you can compel your father to support and educate you without giving yourself up to his custody; in the event of your doing this and if you are unable to support and educate yourself, you might be able to compel him to provide for you in a manner suitable to his means and station in life.

Miss M. S.—Under the laws of the State you mention.

we are of the opinion, that a wife may receive and use her own earnings free from the interference of her husband or his creditors, but that neither husband nor wife can recover compensation for any labor performed or any services rendered for the other; and that, if the property you mention belonged to the wife, she is entitled to the proceeds of the sale, but that if it was her husband's property, she is not entitled to any compensation for services rendered in regard to the same. (2) We think that a husband who (in your State) abandons or neglects to support his wife, without cause, is guilty of a misdemeanor and may be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both. prisonment, or both.

B. F. W., Jr.—You should make your complaint to the United States postal anthorities at Washington, D. C.

United States postal anthorities at Washington, D. C.
Mrs. J. A. S.—We are of the opinion, that, if your husband and his brother owe a debt to the man you mention and the debt is now due, the claimant can sue them and get judgment against them and enforce its payment from whatever property they may own. If the debt you mention is in its nature a mortgage upon the property, the holder of the mortgage can foreclose and have the property sold under foreclosure and your husband and his brother would lose the money they have expended in putting improvements on the land, unless it brought more than enough to satisfy the mortgage and the expenses of foreclosure, in which event they would be entitled to the surplus money.

Letters of Thanks

Dear Sisters and Friends:
I was very kindly remembered by my many pen friends whom I have never seen, yet learned to love, and my dear friends, if you do not hear from me as often as you would like to, it is because I am unable to write long letters often, much as I love to hear from you all.
Let us strive to scatter a little sunshine each day, and brighten the lives of those who are less fortunate then ourselves.

nate than ourselves.

With best wishes to all for health and prosperity,
MRS. D. DEPUE, Blissfield, Mich.

DEAR FRIENDS:

We want to express our thanks to all who have remembered our invalid child, Mildred Carpenter, and to tell you that the tokens of friendship and love to her raises a feeling of gratitude to you that words cannot express. We would like to answer each personally, but it is impossible, so we take this means of thanking all.

Mildred suffers from infantile paralysis, but is improving.

MR. AND MRS. CARPENTER, 621 Bird St., Parkersburg, W. Va.

My dear mother wishes me to thank you all for the great pleasure you have given her; she cannot answer all personally, but each favor is truly ap-preciated. SARAH E. HULL, Cloud Chief, Okla.

DEAR SISTERS: DEAR SISTERS:

I take this method in thanking all who wrote me or sent remembrances; you will think of me on my birthday July 15, I know. May God bless one and all is the prayer of MRS. C. J. HAGERTY, 303 3rd Ave., West, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

I wish to express my most heartfelt thanks to the dear editor for printing my request, and to all the dear sisters who responded. I answered all but one from Buffalo, N. Y. They gave no name.

MISS ANNA REHOR, Wilber, Neb. DEAR READERS :

Tested Recipes from Comfort Sisters The writer's name or initials will appear at the end of one or more of the recipes.—Editor.

Orange Water Ice

Take a dozen fine oranges; squeeze the juice and pour a little boiling water on pulp to extract the juice; the juice of two lemons, and the grated rind of two oranges, and one and one half pounds of granulated sugar and a quart of water; strain and freeze. When about half frozen add the beaten whites of three eggs.

Lemon Water Ice

Half a pint of lemon juice, and the same of water, to which put one pint of syrup, the peel of six lemons rubbed off in sugar, strain, mix and freeze. Then mix up the whites of three eggs to a froth, with a little sugar; when the ice is beginning to set work this well into it and it will be very soft and delicious.

Pineapple Water Ice

Pare and slice two pineapples, and cover with sugar, and let stand over night as you would for sauce, in morning crush and strain, after straining pour over pineapples a pint more water, crush and strain again, sweeten to taste as you have already sweetened some. Make after the same form as Orange or Lemon Ice, only add the whipped whites of half dozen eggs.

Fruit Ice Cream

Make a custard with a quart of milk, five eggs, one and a half pounds of sugar, and a quart of cream. Scald milk and pour it hot upon the yolks of the eggs and sugar; beat the whites of the eggs to a froth and stir in rest; return it to the custard kettle for a few minutes to thicken. When cold beat in the cream and add a pint of any kind of fruit cut up very small or mashed. Bananas, peaches, pineapple or berries of any kind may be used. Put it into the freezer and pack in salt and ice as for any kind of cream. The custard may be partly frozen before putting in the fruit, and it can then be placed in a mould and packed.

Tutti Fruitti Ice Cream

When a plain ice cream of any kind is partly frozen, crystalized fruit of any kind chopped fine may be added, having the same quantity of fruit as you have ice cream. Chopped citron, raisins, English currants, or any candied fruit may be used. Put into a mold and pack in ice and salt. It may be served with whipped cream around it.

MINNIE L. BUTTON, Henderson, Ill.

MINNIE I. BUTTON, Henderson, Ill.

Mustard Pickles

Take an equal quantity of small cucumbers, green tomatoes, sliced cauliflower, picked up small, small button onions. Mix together and cover with strongly salted water, a pint of coarse salt to six quarts boiling water, boiled. skimmed and cooled before using. After twenty-four hours, scald the brine and dissolve in it alum size of a nutmeg. Then pour boiling water over the pickles. When cold, drain very thoroughly, prepare enough vinegar to cover. To one quart of vinegar add one cupful brown sugar, one half cupful flour, one fourth pound ground mustard. Boil sugar and vinegar, mix flour and mustard, stir boiling vinegar into it, when smooth pour over pickles. Put small piece of horseradish in bottle to keep from molding. Melted paraffine may be poured over the top.

Mrs. Lydia L. Eckle.

Lemon Beer

Slice two good-sized lemons, put with o pound of sugar; over this pour one gallon boiling water, and when about milk warm a one third cup of yeast; let it stand over nigl and it is ready for use. L. A. BALLARD.

Mixed Pickles

One gallon each of green tomatoes (sliced), string beans, shelled beans, small cucumbers, one half gallon small onions, one and one half cups sugar, five cents' worth mixed spices, let cucumbers and tomatoes lie in one teacupful of salt over night, cook string beans fifteen minutes, shelled beans ten minutes, onions ten minutes, shelled beans ten minutes, onions ten minutes, let vinegar spices and sugar-come to a boil, add pickles etc., and just raise to a boil, then seal while hot in glass cans, use dwarf lima beans for shelled ones, any thick, fleshy podded string beans, choosing them alike young and tender. Use the smallest of onlon sets. MISS CHRISTEL ALBRIGHT, Charleston, Ill.

Strawberry Filling for Cake or Shortcake

Beat white of one egg very stiff, add three quarters of a cup of powdered sugar, beat again, then add half a cup of fresh strawberries bruised to a pulp, beat all together till stiff; this is delicious on a one layer sponge cake, for dessert or tea.

Strawberry Snow

Cook in double boiler, two cups boiling water, two tablespoonfuls of corn starch, one cup of sugar, when thick remove from the fire, add the juice of two cups of strawberries, beat the whites of two eggs stiff, add a very little sugar, and pour over all.

Old-fashioned Strawberry Shortcake

Make a good rich biscuit crust, make in jelly cake tins, while it is baking, take about half of the berries you are going to use, and cut (do not mash) them up, and add sugar, letting them stand awhile, when the cake is baked, split open (it should be about two inches thick), butter, put on a layer of the whole berries, a liberal supply of sugar, and as much butter as you can afford, then put on the other piece of crust and butter-side up, and repeat the process, using up berries for the center and a row of whole berries around the edge, sprinkle on more sugar, dot with bits of butter and set in oven a few moments for the berries to warm through. Cut the cake as you would a pie in wedge-shaped pieces.

A Post Card Album That Will Hold Fifty Cards.

Our fifty-card Album is the most attractive on the market. On each page two cards may be displayed; the leaves are very heavy rigid paper stock of a heavy green shade, providing a very tasty and attractive background for all cards, and when two pages are opened together showing four cards, the appearance is extremely attractive, and one cannot neatly preserve a collection of Post Cards unless they are displayed in an Album. And better still, a very nice collection of Souvenir Postal Cards represents the individual and personal thought of absent or distant relatives and friends and they are very entertaining for visitors who enjoy looking them over; so, that in an Album, arranged in order, they are readily accessible and may be examined time after time with no harm to the Cards, and thus preserved in remembrance of the senders. No one thinks of collecting Souvenir Cards without an Album. Everyone wants an Album and the demand, just now, exceeds the supply. We are fortunate in having a great quantity on hand of first-class Albums which we are to distribute as premiums to those who will send us clubs of subscribers to this magazine as per our offer below.

Club Offer For a club of only 2 yearly subscribers to this magazine as a beginning towards filling the Album.

gar will discolor but signty. It is not so powerful as the others.

Belle E. Clark, Wanconda, Ill., sends a remedy for malaria and its attendant ills which she says has for twenty years prevented malaria, bilious fever, headaches and rheumatism in her case. It is as follows: Cut up four lemons, rind, pulp and all and boil in half gallon of water—one lemon to the pint—till rind is soft and whole is boiled down to one quart. Dose, one teaspoonful before each meal. It is as well a fine spring tonic, acting directly upon the liver. Lemons should be boiled in covered granite dish or pot. K. T., Bakersfield, Cal.—Shampoo your hair with egg shampoo and apply the following tonic: Bay rum, ten ounces; resorcin, twenty grains; cantharides, three drams. Use the tonic every other day. Massage the scalp for ten minutes every day. Use the shampoo once in two weeks.

other day. Massage the scalp for ten minutes every day. Use the shampoo once in two weeks.

Miss D. D., Lacrosse, Wis.—Your blood is not necessarily thick to cause it to "rush to the head". You, should diet yourself and get your digesticn to working properly. If you will read a book—there are many of them—on physical culture, you will get advice there that if followed will put you in much better shape than medicine will, if you eat the proper food. (2) There are various reasons why your limbs should swell, but we can't offer advice without knowing something about the case. You may be dropsical. Have you ever consuited a physician in your own town? If not, why not?

E. S., Red Bluff, Cal.—Pimples, which are only another form of blackheads are normal at your age (14), and if you will use a little care in your diet, not eating too much fat or greasy food, and few sweets, with no coffee, you will find that they will disappear. It is well to press them out when it may be done without too much pressure. Here is a simple but efficacious lotion: Two ounces of green soap mixed with two ounces of liquid extract of witch-hazel. Bathe the face with this night and morning and wash off with hot water, then cold.

V. C. P., London, N. H.—A short visit to Colored would not be of any great benefit to wash off with hot water, then cold.

V. C. P., London, N. H.—A short visit to Colorado would not be of any great benefit to your catarrh, but if you could remain there for several months you would get rid of it. Either there or in Arizona or New Mexico. Any part of Colorado is good, as it is high and dry. Catarrh of the stomach calls for special treatment in diet, and you must get your digestive organs into good working condition.

A. Z. New York, N. Y.—The best thing we

A. Z., New York, N. Y.—The best thing we know of for "a weak mind and a sensitive head" is to go somewhere where there is quiet and good company. If you wish to stay in New York, however, we advise that you try the Psychopathic Ward at Bellevue.

J. R. B., Pleasant Shade, Tenn.—We cannot go into details. Suppose you consult a physician in your own town. If he can do better than we can, he is the man you need. Our opinion of the advice we gave remains unchanged. Tell your doctor what we told you.

Subscriber, Grafton, Neb.—The flushes to the face that trouble you after eating are no doubt largely due to indigestion. Just what food you should eat we cannot tell you, but you can find out by trying the very simplest diet—rice, eggs, milk with crackers—until you have seen what the result is. Drink no coffee and only very weak tea, if any. Proper exercise would aid materially. Read some book on physical culture. Unless some thing is radically wrong with you, the trouble should be removed in a few weeks.

N. B. M. Pleasant Ridge. O The rate.

few weeks.

N. B. M., Pleasant Ridge, O.—The pain around your left chest may be muscular, and due to neuralgic affection, or it may be caused by indigestion which affects the heart, by gases forming and causing an upward pressure against that organ. If this is the case, your heart is all right, but your stomach is not. Diet yourself and get your digestion good, and see if the pain doesn't stop. An aid to digestion and to reducing this pressure is a half teaspoonful of ordinary cooking soda in a glass of water shortly after eating. Also when you go to bed at night. If it is neuralgic, try chloroform liniment on flannel held tightly over the pain point until you almost blister. Then let the air to it and try another spot near by. Neuralgia is one of the ills you have always, if it ever gets started.

Distressed Reader, Elmont, N. D.—Superflu-

the ills you have always, if it ever gets started. Distressed Reader, Elmont, N. D.—Superfluous hair can only be permanently removed by a specialist, and at a cost which puts it beyond the reach of most people. The ordinary depilatories are no better than a razor, if as safe. (2) You might whiten your neck with peroxide of hydrogen, which is a skin whitener, but a better plan is to take a teaspoonful of phosphate of soda each morning in water. Ask your druggist about the peroxide before you use it. If you will let the sunshine and air get to your neck as often as possible you will be benefited. W. J., Iowa Falls, Ia.—Thick lips are of nature's own making, and they cannot be reduced to any appreciable extent. Better let them alone.

Worried Child, Carrolton, Me.—First tell your mother about the pain and let her take you to a physician. At your age you must be very careful, as neglect now may result seriously.

careful, as neglect now may result seriously.

A. H., Augusta, Ky.—We think you are wise to go to Colorado or Arizona for your catarrh, and to stay there. As you are a carpenter and willing to work at anything, you should have no trouble in finding plenty to do, but you will have to go after it yourself, unless you know someone living West who can find work for you. Summer rates for settlers in the West prevail now, and you can get to Colorado at small outlay. It would pay you to go to Cincinnati and make inquiries at railroad offices, as to rates and as to chances for work. They want men in the West, and if you can do the work you'll find it to do, all right.

E. F., Crystal, N. D.—For redness of the

E. F., Crystal, N. D.—For redness of the skin use once a day, applying on absorbent cotton: Muriate of ammonia, one dram, tannic acid, half dram; glycerine, two ounces; rose water, three ounces. You had better consult a physician who can examine you, as to the excessive heat from which you suffer.

M. M. Calmar, Iowa.—See answer above to Blue Bell, Goodwater, Ala.—We will have to know more about the nature of the brown spots before we can venture any advice. Ordinarily they are due to liver disorders, and dieting will remove them remove them.

Country Girl, Strawn, Kans.—You can reduce our flesh only by eating plain food, no fat, sweets, potatoes or white bread, very little water, and take vigorous exercise. Your hips may be made smaller by massaging them, night and morning. Hair that is not naturally curly cannot be made to curl except by mechanical means, curling irons or papers. You will find answers to your other questions to other inquirers in this column. Read it carefully. Reader, Arton, Wis.—You may relieve the gas in your stomach by drinking a half teaspoonful of cooking soda in a glass of hot water after meals. Your heavy headache comes from indigestion, as does the gas, and you must eat only such food as you can easily digest. You can best determine this yourself, by watching the effect your food has upon you.

E. A. S., Bowling Green, Ky.—The information you want is chiefly of that kind possessed by specialists, and is their stock in trade and not obtainable. You may get somewhat near it by asking questions of the druggists in your town. It is safe to say that you cannot get the full strength of any root or herb by boiling it in water. Unless you know pretty well the ways of preparing medicines from herbs, we venture the opinion, that you cannot greatly improve upon the medicines you can buy already prepared. About the best way to use roots and herbs is to make "tea" of them by putting them in boiling water in closed vessels and letting them stak all their nittees out.

Watch Your Thirty Feet of Bowels!

OU have thirty feet of Intestines! What makes food travel through them?

A set of Muscles that line the walls of these Intestines or Bowels.

When a piece of Food rubs the walls of the Intestines these Muscles tighten behind it, and thus it starts a Muscle-wave which drives it through the whole length of the Bowels.

It should take about 12 hours to do this properly, so that nutritious parts of the food may have time to be digested and absorbed.

But, - if it takes twice or three times that period the food spoils in passing, and becomes as poisonous as if it had decayed before being eaten.

Now, the cause of delay (Constipation) is simply Weakness, or Laziness of the Bowel-Muscles.

Want of Exercise, Indoor Employment, weakens these Bowel-Muscles, just as it weakens Arm and Leg Muscles.

"Physic" like Salts, Calome, Jalap, Phosphate of Soda, Mineral Waters, simply flush-out the Bowels for the one occasion

They do not remove the Cause of Constipation.

But this is different with Cascarets.

Cascarets act on the Muscles of the Bowels and Intestines. They act just as Cold Water, or Exercise act on a Lazy man.

They act like exercise. A Cascaret produces the same sort of Natural result that a Six Mile walk in the country would produce. The Vest Pocket Box is sold by all Druggists, at Ten Cents.

Be very careful to get the genuine, made only by the Sterling Remedy Co., and never sold in bulk. Every tablet stamped "CCC."

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT readers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta Maine.

Oklahoma Girl, Glencoe, Okla.—If it is the custom in your community to go bare-headed to church, then you may do so. Usually women go to church in hats or bonnets. (2) A girl cannot do society and school at the same time with any degree of success. Plenty of time for society after school has been finished. (3) It seems to be popular for young men to call girls by the pet name of "Kid", and the girls seem to like it—anyway as they grow older.

Triplets, Virgilina, Va.—It is generally understood when a girl is out of school—that is, has finished her school education—she is old enough for beaus, though she may be younger than seventeen. (2) We cannot tell you how the very tall boy is to take the very short girl's arm. If he can't-find a way he shouldn't take her arm.

arm. If her arm.

Lyla, Huntsville, Wash.—Introduce the sisters as you would introduce anybody else. In very formal introductions the eldest sister is Miss Smith, say, and the younger sisters are Miss Mary Smith, Miss Susan Smith and so on. (2) To small informal girls' parties a girl may go without a chaperon, as usually at such parties several older women look after all of ihem.

Golden Curl, Riverton, Ky.—This "girl friend" of yours appears to be anything but the kind of a friend a young man ought to have, as she has proved herself to be a tale-bearer and mischiefmaker. Your best plan is to have no more to do with her, and let the whole matter drop.

do with her, and let the whole matter drop.

Troubled Sixteen, Anaconda, Mont.—Don't worry about your excessive fatness—one hundred and forty pounds for a girl five feet five, is not so bad. Still, if you want to lose about ten or fifteen pounds, you might quit eating fats and sweets of all kinds, potatoes and bread, except tale. Take plenty of vigorous exercise. To remove the fatness about the eyes massage the face, rubbing gently but thoroughly, downward and toward the ears. Do it for five minutes, every night and morning.

Grav-eved Girl, Lakeside, Minn.—You may

Gray-eyed Girl, Lakeside, Minn.—You may improve the fullness of your neck by massaging night and morning, for five minutes, rubbing upward from the chest. You cannot make your face and hands white, if you are naturally of dark complexion. You might try a teaspoonful of phosphate of soda in water every morning to clear the skin. (2) Don't use soap on a greasy nose. Cleanse it every night with the following team: Orange flower water, and almond oil, each, four cunces; white wax, two ounces, and remove at once with a soft towel. In the morning bathe in hot water, then cold. Then use a little toilet water of any sort, to be had at any drug store.

Blue-eyed Flossie, Moline, Kans.—In our opinion your "Phil" is a flirt, and he only cares for you when no other girl is in sight. You had better shake Phil, and shake him hard.

better shake Phil, and shake him hard.

Perplexed, Alpharetta, Ga.—If you really care for the young lady whose father objects to your writing to her, why not write a polite letter to the father asking his permission to continue the correspondence? Try it, and if it fails let us know and we will advise further.

Marguerite, Elwood, Neb.—The young man has a right to carry another girl's picture when he comes to see you, unless he is engaged to you. There is no good reason, however, why he should tell you about it, nor to tell you he doesn't care for her. (2) Keep the chap's arm from around your waist. That is not the place for it, unless you are engaged. (3) It does not follow because he is attentive to you that he wants to make you his wife. Men can be, and ought to be, very polite to women without wanting to marry them. Men are sometimes useful in other ways than as husbands.

Here is a new idea folding Hat that will furnish fun in quantities for all. A new idea in headgear, practical and useful. If you are troubled with headaches during extremely hot weather, this light weight and comfortable Hat is suitable protection from the suns' hot rays, and serves nearly all purposes of the usual straw hat.

This is a useful and practical Hat, for any purpose or occasion, except in Alaska, being made of thousands of feet of paperet, woven and folded in the most ingenious manner. It is extremely light in weight and appearance. It conforms readily to your head and fits perfectly.

When not in use the Hat folds flat, as shown in the upper illustration, and can be carried in the pocket with no danger of injury. The flexible paper these Hats are made of is strong and durable; one Hat will wear a long time. They are made in a variety of colors, finished perfectly with colored band just like a regular straw hat. People who are outdoors in the summer-time, for labor or leasure, at the seashore or in the field, will find this unique Hat a perfect comfort and convenience. We have imported a whole quantity for our exclusive use, doubtful if you can find them elsewhere, so you should send to us now, as we have them ready to seen dby mail.

Blue Bell, Defiance, O.—The lady may do as she pleases about rising when introductions take place. To meet another woman, a venerable man, or distinguished person, she should rise, we think. Sally, Vassar, Kans.—Really, Sally, we are almost ashamed of you to be asking what "Skidoo" means. We thought everybody knew that it meant "23" for yours". Of course it should be used in answer to "S. W. A. K."

C. C. B., Zion City, Ill.—The lady extends her hand if she wishes to shake upon introduction, and the man waits until she does. Otherwise there is no shake. (2) You are supposed to use a table napkin gracefully and efficiently, and not as if it were a towel or a handkerchief.

there is no shake. (2) You are supposed to use a table napkin gracefully and efficiently, and not as if it were a towel or a handkerchief. Lonely, Atherton, Ohio.—Notwithstanding your ambition, your education, your good manners and business qualifications, the girls don't like you, because they instinctively size you up as lacking in the attractive quality. There are plenty more just like you. Whatever that quality is it is born in people and cannot be perfectly acquired, but it may be approximated. Suppose you select some good woman who knows men and knows you and ask her to tell you frankly what the matter is and to show you how to remedy it as far as possible. Believe exactly what she tells you about yourself and follow her instructions to the letter. First of all you need broadening, even if it rips wide open many of your cherished notions. However, ask the woman to help you.

Backwoodsy, Mason, Texas.—It is somewhat uncertain as to when a woman is of age. In states where she can vote she must be twenty-one; in other states where she may be considered of age when she can contract marriage without consent of her parents, the time varies from eighteen to twenty-one, except in Delaware, District of Columbia, Idaho, Maryland, New York and Tennessee, where the age is sixteen, and in California and N. Dakota, where it is fifteen. Generally speaking, she is not of age until she is twenty-one. (2) Ordinary rules of letter-writing do not apply to postal cards, at least, the present picture post cards. They may be sent by anyone to anybody at any time from any place.

A Free Treatment To All Who Ask

If you are sick—if you suffer—if you are afflicted with any ailment—if you are worn out, tired or failing—if you have an ache or a pain—if you need medical advice—if you are not in perfect health—if you lack the energy, vim, vigor and "go" that make life worth living; whether you are rich or poor—old or young—man or woman, read what I have to say, hear what I have to offer you.

Positive Proof Without Price

I have probably had more experience and more success than any living physician, but I don't ask you to believe that. I don't ask you to believe that my remedies are better than others. I don't ask you to take my word for anything. But I do ask you to give me a chance to prove my ability—to prove what my treatment will do for you—to prove that I can cure you—and to prove it at my own expense—to pay the cost, every penny of it myself. I ask permission to send you—to deliver into your hands—absolutely without cost to you a proof treatment that will convince you. Remedies that have cured thousands, remedies that I believe will cure you.

May I Send The Proof?

This is all I ask. No money—No promises to buy—No papers. On the virtue of my treatment I base my reputation. On your gratitude and honesty I base my hope of reward. I hold the record of thousands of cures—not "some better," but cured to stay cured—restored to perfect health. Is the prospect of being hearty and strong and big and well worth a few minutes of your time and a two-cent stamp? That's all it costs. Don't let the opportunity pass.

All Diseases

All afflictions that can be cured by medicine—many that others consider incurable—no matter how many remedies you have vainly tried—no matter how many other doctors have failed. Curing desperate chronic cases is my specialty. Rheumatism, Kidney Trouble, All Diseases of the Stomach, Liver and Bowels, Catarrh, Diseases of the Bladder and Prostate Gland, Nervousness, All Female Troubles, Weak Lungs, Asthma, Bronchitis and Chronic Coughs, All Skin Diseases, Scrofula, Impure Blood, Partial Paralysis, Piles, Heart Disease, Lumbago, Anaemia, General Debility. All Chronic Ailments are being cured every day. Thousands have been cured in the past—many just like your case. Won't you let me try to cure you?

The Proof Is Free This is all you have to do—Write me a description of your case—write me fully and freely and freely and to make me successful. I want to succeed in your case—I want you to help me. Tell me how you are and by return mail I will send you the proof treatment, sealed in a plain wrapper, postage paid, and free—free to you—free to any afflicted friend or neighbor. It may mean long life, health—strength—vigor—to you, if you write me today. You have nothing to lose, everything to gain. Address

Now both, who were so devoted in life, are sleeping side by side in the McKinley Mausoleum on Monument Hill, Canton, Ohio; their last resting-place is the gift of the nation and is to be dedicated September 30th next. Mrs. McKinley expressed a desire that she might witness its completion. This wish however was not gratified.

desire that she might witness its completion. This wish however was not gratified.

The married life of the late President Mc-Kinley and his wife was one from which all may learn a lesson. It was an ideal life, and the sickness of the wife only brought out, and accentuated the nobleness of the husband's character. It was "in sickness and in health until death do us part" for them. There were no scandals or clouds to mar the beauty and perfection of this union. In a divorce cursed country such as ours, the married life of Mr. and Mrs. McKinley stands out like a beautiful blossom in a miry morass. The sweetness of crease in the number of the married women acting as bread winners in 1900 over 1890. Out of the 303 occupations of which the Bureau has record, women were represented in all but nine. Five women were employed as pilots; 10 as baggagemen; 31 as brakemen; 7 as conductors;

26 as switchmen; 45 as engineers and firemen; 43 as hackdrivers; 2 as roofers and slaters; 6 as ship carpenters; 508 as machinists; 185 black-smiths; 8 boilermakers; 31 charcoal, coke and

About one fourth of the working women were employed as servants; 458,405 were farm laborers; 96 per cent. of the latter were employed in Southern States, and 361,804 of them were negroes. 338,-144 women supported themselves as dressmakers; 327,206 were teachers; 328,935 did laundry work; 307,706 were farmers; 231,458 were mill operatives and textile workers, and 146,929 were housekeepers and stewardesses. Doctor Chalmers, medical officer of the City of Glasgow, Scotland, has been inquiring into condemns the kissing of infants; this practice he alleges, being the cause of much infant mortality. The doctor is undoubtedly right in his surmises, and your editor trusts that those mothers and women generally who are in the habit of kissing infants upon the lips, immedi-HE passing of Mrs. Wm. McKinley, the wife of our late beloved president, recalls the sad tragedy of her husband's death and the ideal married habit of kissing infants upon the lips, immedi-ately cease the practice, a practice exceedingly dangerous to their beloved babes. There are plenty of ways of showing your affection for a child without kissing it upon the lips. A baby is a poor helpless creature, unable to defend it-selt, and generally its lips when kissed are wide open, and the saliva of the adult goes right in-to the child's system. Many of those people who kiss babies are consumptives or have various forms of stomach trouble, and thus the germs of disease are conveyed to the helpless germs of disease are conveyed to the helpless babies, whose powers of resistence are slight. If the infant does not succumb to this adult was an invalid for more then half of her life. She firmly believed in her husband's destiny, and it was she who encouraged him to go forward to the goal of his ambition—the presidency. His tender solicitude and devotion to her, were well known, and when he departed this life, his distracted widow prayed earnestly for death, so that she might join him beyond the grave. Mrs. McKinley would often say: "He is gone, and life is dark to me now." Her last words were: "Why should I linger, please God, if it is Thy will why defer it."

Ida Saxton McKinley was born in Canton, Ohio, June, 1847. Her father was a banker, and she was reared in a home of comfort and refinement. She taught Sunday-school in the Presbyterian church, and young lawyer Wilosculation, it contracts various aliments, which undermine its constitution, and make life a burden to it in after years. Fondly careas and love your baby to your heart's content, kiss its cheek and brow, but for Heaven's sake keep your lips from its mouth.

Your editor wishes to warn adults from prof-fering their lips to ailing or diseased persons. Far be it from the writer to attempt to inveigh Far be it from the writer to attempt to inveigh against kissing, when indulged in by healthy youths and maidens, during the period of love's young dream, but remember, microbes are no respecters of persons, and if an individual deposits the germs of disease upon your lips, they will be taken into your system, and as is their habit, they will increase and multiply and at once commence their work of destruction, possibly with fatal results to yourself.

Some people have constitutions that are sibly with fatal results to yourself.

Some people have constitutions that are strong enough to combat and throw off the attacks of disease germs from without and within, but such is not the case with all of us, and even the strongest at times fall ready victims to these insidious foes of humanity. Many a man and woman, suffering from certain forms of disease have scattered death and destruction far and wide through the medium of osculation. Some cases of disease are far more deadly than bullets, and kill more surely.

tion. Some cases of disease are far more dead-ly than bullets, and kill more surely. It is a custom, and a very wise one, in some cities for the health officer to visit all families, where there is a case of tuberculosis. The of-ficer warns the members of these families, that ficer warns the members of these families, that kissing the afflicted consumptive is not only dangerous, but is liable to bring about the death of the person indulging in the practice. The kissing of young people and children by aged persons is also a great mistake, when the lips are the medium of this particular method of expressing affection. Indiscriminate kissing is sure to result in the contracting of some physical trouble, it may not be acute, but it will demonstrate itself in some form or other eventually. We would suggest to all except lovers (who are, of course, prepared to take risks, and the consequences of those risks), to receive a kiss either on the cheek or brow, and by averting the head it is easily possible to avoid being kissed upon the lips, and when form or necessity compels the bestowal of a caress by friend or relative, let that caress be bestowed upon brow or cheek, but never upon bestowed upon brow or cheek, but never upon the lips.

Your friend. Comfort's Editor.

The Census Bureau has given us some interesting facts, and probably the most interesting is its latest returns concerning women workers. It appears that the total number of women workers 16 years of age and over in this country in 1900, was 23,485,559. Out of this total, 4,833,630 were employed at some kind of work. Most of the women workers were young; 68.4 per cent. being under 35 years of age; 44.2 per cent. under 25, and 25.6 per cent. under 21; 15.9 per cent. were married, 17.7 per cent. were widows, and 1.3 were divorced. Of the number of divorced women, 55 per cent. cent. were widows, and 1.3 were divorced. Of the number of divorced women, 55 per cent. were supporting themselves wholly or in part. Of those that work, 1,771,966 were born in the United States, their parents also being natives of this country; 1,080,744 of the women workers born in this country, were the daughters of immigrants; 840,011 white women workers were immigrants; 1,119,621 were negro women; 11,288 Indian and Mongolian women. The number of women that work has more than doubled in the twenty years from 1880 to 1900. A French engineer declares that the result of Peter Cooper Hewet's recent discovery will en-able one to cross the ocean from New York to Liverpool in sixty hours. Emperor William is leaving little undone to win American friendship. It is said that he is sending to Harvard and Columbia universities presents of three valuable works. Much of the old Campanile is being built into the new and the old angel will again be high on its top and the old bell from Crete hang on the summit.

German copper workers on strike have had a stroke of luck which rarely falls to any body of men in such circumstances. Ostrich Farming "Usually Americans think of the ostrich as a bird from some far-away desert land," said a man from the Southwest, "but the ostrich is getting to be as American as the turkey is. There are three ostrich farms in California, one There are three ostrich farms in California, one each in Arizona, Florida and Kansas, with about 6,000 of the big birds thriving as on their native heath. A full-sized bird is about 10 feet tall and weighs 350 pounds. They are picked every nine months, and the feathers undergo careful treatment before they can be worn on ladies' hats. The ostrich is a model husband. When he is about five years old, he chooses a mate and sticks by her till death does them part. The ostrich is good for eighty years. He makes the nest, helps sit on the eggs, and does most of the work. But he wants to kill the young ones. Forty days are required to hatch an ostrich egg. The shell is so thick, that when the youngster inside makes a noise, the shell must be broken by somebody on the outside of it to let him out."

Concerning Olives

"The average person in the country places," said the grocery drummer, "is not fond of olives. Indeed, olives are a cultivated taste. said the greery drummer, his hot fond of olives. Indeed, olives are a cultivated taste. But they are coming into more general use as the advertisers get their qualities before all kinds of eaters. A Detroit man told me the other day that the grocerymen in that city sold three times as many olives now than they did five years ago, and I suppose the increase, though not quite that large, perhaps, is pretty general over the whole country. Some people may think this increase due to the olive production of California, but it is not so as California olives decay when pickled, and are made into oil instead of pickles. Italian olives are so irregular in size and quality that they also go into oil. That leaves Spain as the olive supply of the world, practically. The U.S. gets most of its Spanish olives from a district within 100 miles of Seville. They are prepared in Spain for table use, stuffed or otherwise, and are shipped to this country in 200 gallon barare shipped to this country in 200 gallon bar-rels, and here they are bottled for the retail trade. You may not like an olive at first, but the taste grows on you and you can eat them after a while in any quantity because they are easily digestible and very healthy."

The Automobile Business

"There's never happened anything in this country with such a growth as the automobile business," said the man who looked grimy and smelled of gasolene. "Seven or eight years ago smelled of gasolene. "Seven or eight years ago an auto was a rare curiosity that was found only in circus parades. Today it is a great business in which hundreds of millions are invested. In 1900 there were only about a hundred cars in this country. In 1906 there were 24,274 cars sold, representing a value of over fifty millions of dollars. The average price of a car in 1908 was $1,170, and in 1906 it was $2,087. This is the average of all makes. American cars are much lower priced, the average being $1,429, while the average price of the foreign car was $6,710. We imported over 1,300 cars, valued at about five million dollars, to which must be added 45 per cent. of duty, 1,300 cars, valued at about five million dollars, to which must be added 45 per cent. of duty, making it over seven millions. At the last auto show in New York City, the cost of the decorations of the show hall were $75,000, the place was crowded for a week, 124,000 persons being in attendance and it is estimated that cars were sold to the value of ten million dollars. It is the greatest fad in history, but it will be a permanent thing by and by, for the whiz wagon has come to stay."

Caring for Immigrants

"An excellent thing," said the thrifty-looking man, "is the Industral Removal Office in New York city which distributes over the country Jewish immigrants, and every religcountry Jewish immigrants, and every religious organization ought to have one, or more like it. The Office has been in existence for six years and during that time it has sent out of New York city 29,413 persons, nearly all, fresh arrivals from Russia. The Office selects the best specimens it can find among the new-comers and sends them to points where there is a demand for them. Some become farmers, many are mechanics and others are traders and plain laborers. To show how much better it is many are mechanics and others are traders and plain laborers. To show how much better it is for them to get out of the big city and into the smaller places I will cite a few instances. Men sent to Toledo are receiving from $16 to $18 a week, and to Omaha from $15 to $25 a week. Six men sent to Columbus, O., have $900 in bank; of nine sent to Nashville, Tenn., three now own their own stores; two carpenters sent to Minneapolis, have $1,500 in bank, and one shoemaker has his own house; 29 sent to Rochester, N. Y., have money and property valued at $8,008. Of the 200 sent to South Bend, Ind., mostly on farms, all are at work, and satisfied and are saving money. None of these had employment in New York, and none of them had any money to speak of. They of them had any money to speak of. They could work and were willing to, which explains their success. It is estimated that the yearly earnings of the immigrants distributed over the country by the Office are in the neighborhood of eight million of dollars. There is plenty of room and opportunity for the industrious and thrifty in every state and the authorities ought to wake up and secure the right kind of fresh people."

CHAPTER I.

REMORSE WILL DRIVE YOU TO DESPAIR. RANDMA, who named me Eglah?"

"My cousin, Bishop Vivian,

"My cousin, Bishop Vivian, when he baptized you."
"Do you think he had any right to put such a label on me?"
"Certainly, because your father selected your name, and the bishop had no choice."
"It is so ugly, I never can like it, and a little baby that can't speak her mind ought not to be tied to something she must drag all her life and hate forever and ever."
"Eat your breakfast, and try to be a good, quiet child, then your name will not trouble you so much."

quiet child, then your name will not trouble you so much."

"I never shall like it, any more than you do, and you know, grandma, when you call me your mouth twists like you had toothache."

"I was not consulted about your name. It belonged to your New England Grandmother Kent, and as it appears you belong only to your father, you were called after his mother. I heard him tell you it was the name of a queen—one of David's wives."

"Yes, but I found out she was not the head queen—one of David's wives.

"Yes, but I found out she was not the head queen—just a sort of step-wife queen. Now if I could only be the pet queen, Sheba, I should not fret at all."

"The Queen of Sheba was not David's

"The Queen of Sheba was not David's wife."

"You are all wrong about your Bible, grandma, because you are only a Methodist. David's Sheba was nicknamed Bath Sheba, for the reason that he saw her going to her bath-house, and she looked so pretty. I saw her picture in father's 'Piscopal Bible."

"There there! Be quiet. Drink your milk." Mrs. Maurice leaned back in her chair and sighed as she looked down at the fragile child beside her. The tall, silver coffee urn showed in repousse on one side the flight of Europa, on the other Dirce dragged to death. Eglah could never understand how the strands of the victim's hair supported the weight of her form, and wondered why they did not give way and set the prisoner free. Today she eyed it askance, then surveyed her own fair image reflected in the polished, smooth surface below the band of figures.

"Grandma, don't you think horses are much nicer for ladies to ride than oxen?"

"Yes, my dear."

"Then why did you buy ox riders?" one small finger pointed to the heirloom fetich.

"I did not buy the urn. It has belonged to your grandfather Maurice's family for one hundred and fifty years, and was brought from Old England. Eliza, take her away. If she cannot be silent, sae must go back and have her meals with you. It seems impossible to teach her that in the presence of grown people children are expected to listen."

Mrs. Mitchell came forward from a side table, lifted the little girl from her chair, and untied the ruffled bib that protected her with and untied the ruffled bib that protected her with and until the product her will let you sit at

"Now tell grandmother you are sorry you annoyed her, and if she will let you sit at her table you will be as quiet as she wishes."

"Ma-Lila, don't make me tell stories; she doesn't believe them, and I am so tired saying things I don't mean. I want to go back to the side table, where you are not always scolding me. Grandma, it will be peacefuller if I stay with Ma-Lila—" me. Grandma, it will be peacefuller if I stay with Ma-Lila—"

"Hush! Come here."
Mrs. Maurice lifted the little one's dimpled chin and studied the fair face that had bloomed seven years in her lonely home: a winsome face cut like a gem, velvety-brown eyes, long-lashed, and the pure, pale oval set in a shining bronze frame of curling hair, all chestnut in shade, braided with gold when sunshine hid among the ripples.

all chestnut in shade, braided with gold when sunshine hid among the ripples.

"Kent: Kent—even her ears small as any other rogue's. She is her father's child."

"Is that a sin, grandma?"

Mrs. Maurice swiftly laid her hand over the uplifted, upbraiding eyes, to veil something in their depths that often disquieted her, and sought refuge in her habitual command:

"Take her away, Eliza."

Ringing the small bell close to the breakfast tray, the mistress took a spray of starry jasmine from the vase in the center of the table, and as she turned away said to the gray-haired butler:

butler:

"Aaron, you will put a plate and chair for Miss Eglah at the side table until further orders. Tell Oliver I shall not want the carriage until four o'clock."

I nusually tall and very handsome was this stately widow of a Confederate general who had been slain during one of the fierce conflicts around beleaguered Richmond. No white hairs marred the glossy blackness of the thick flicts around beleaguered Richmond. No white hairs marred the glossy blackness of the thick coil half hidden under a snowy crepe cap, and the brilliant blue eyes were undimmed by tearful years of widowhood—a widowhood involving for her the full, sad significance of the sacred and melancholy term, an inability to forget, a despair of any earthly consolation, and a jealous reticence that denied all discus-sion of her sorrow, as she would have defended her dead from an alien's rude touch. To her, time had brought neither oblivion nor allevia-tion only a sharroned sense of irreparable tion, only a sharpened sense of irreparable bereavement; and as one standing in an un-ending and hopeless eclipse, she accepted the gloom with a stern and silent rejection of all other lights when the sun of her life went down.

Anniversaries are electric batteries that Anniversaries are electric patteries that thrill the domain of emotions, and one day out of every three hundred and sixty-five the strings of memory are keyed to their utmost tension, vibrating with an intolerable intensity that reddens the lips of old wounds and sity that reddens the lips of old wounds and quickens dull aches to stinging torture.

This memorial morning Mrs. Maurice crossed the wide, vaulted hall, and passing through the long, pillared drawing-room, opened a locked door and shut herself in a darkened chamber to keep tryst with the sacred souvenirs that represented all she held dear. Raising the window, she turned the blinds to allow sunlight entrance into this silent reliquary filled with mementos jealously guarded "in solemn salvatory": a heavy,

On a leathern couch lay a folded Confederate uniform, and a man's straw hat, cane, spurs, and riding whip had been placed beside the faded gray coat. Over the old-fashioned, high marble mantel hung a portrait of General Egbert Maurice, clad in uniform, wearing three stars and a wreath on his collar, and holding his plumed hat in his right hand. At one corner of the mantel a furled Confederate flag leaned until it touched the frame of the picture, and from the marble shelf, where lay the general's sash and sword, hung the stained and torn guidon of his favorite regiment. On the wall opposite the firely lace the portrait of a lovely girl with an at a furled confederate flag leaned until it touched the frame of the picture, and from the marble shelf, where lay the general's sash and sword, hung the stained and torn guidon of his favorite regiment. On the wall opposite the firely lace the portrait of a lovely girl with an at a pron full of roses seemed to fill the room with radiance and color.

With a slow, caressing movement, Mrs. Maurice's slim white hand passed over the forn tof the smoking-gown, and fastened in a button hole the syray of fragrant, satingle cost, she held it to her heart in a tight, straining clasp, as she seated herself on the couch, and her fingers lingered on tarnished gilt buttons and braid. Inside the uniform was pinned a parcel wrapped in tissue paper, from which she took out a mass of yellowed lace, and as the filmy folds of an infant's christening robe swept across her lap, a subtle perfume of wither ered flowers like the breath of a rose jar stole over the room.

With dry eyes she looked long at one portrait, then at the other: the husband of her good night, and on the pillow found a farewell note, praying fo long called her home. Loving Marcia very warmly, she had attempted to intercede with the indignant mother, and one of her letters had enclosed an appeal from the erring daughter. It was returned unopened, and accompanied by a very positive assurance that any future repetition would not be forgiven. Old friends gathered to greet the returned traveler, yet all intuitively avoided allusion to the domestic cancer that, despite her proud, silent composure, was eating the heart barred against sympathy. She learned from the newspapers that under the new Federal regime Judge Kent was temporarily Senator, and that after a season in Washington he and Marcia were living at a hotel in her own neighboring city; but as the latter had followed her husband into the Episcopal Church, no meeting occurred between parent and child. So complete was the estrangement, and so unapproachable the stern, silent attitude of the mother, that when Dr. Eggleston, the family physician, and Bishop Vivian, the favorite cousin, called early one morning on an urgent errand, both realized that they championed a forlorn and desperate cause in battling with this old lioness robbed of her young.

Instinctively she divined their mission as her eyes fell upon a letter lying on the bishop's knee, and her lips narrowed and tightened.

Instinctively she divined their mission as her eyes fell upon a letter lying on the bishop's knee, and her lips narrowed and tightened. Standing on the hearth with her arms folded, she listened quietly to her cousin's impassioned pleading for forgiveness and to the doctor's distressing presentation of Marcia's alarming condition, which he felt constrained to pronounce hopeless.

"Madem, if you deny her dying prayer, remorse will drive you to despair."

"She has been dead to me since the hour she deliberately deceived and forsook me. Kent's wife ceased to be my child when she insulted, disgraced, her father's name."

"Oh, Patricia, how can you hope or claim God's mercy for yourself if you refuse pardon to your repentant and unhappy daughter?"

A spark leaped into the cold clear eyes.

"For mercy I think I shall never need to plead, and when my God grants me justice I will try to be satisfied."

"Will you not at least read the few lines the

She walked to the window and, holding the curtain aside, read the brief petition:

Leaning eagerly forward, the two gray-haired men watched and listened for some re-lenting token; but after a few moments she turned toward a desk, and with no change in the frozen calm of her handsome face, she merely traced a word at the bottom of the page, handed it to the bishop, and left the room. "Come."

That night a cold waxen image of a boy whose soul refused to enter its clay tabernacle was laid for a moment in Eliza Mitchell's arms, to be kissed as only young mothers can kiss their dead first-born. The following day the hospital ambulance brought back on a stretcher the wan form of the erring daughter, who fainted from exhaustion as the bearers carried her into the home of her fathers. Three days later she died in her mother's arms, whispering with icy lips: "If my baby lives, keep her for my sake— for my sake."

So little Eglah Kent was given, when three hours old, to the care of the young fostermother Eliza, and slept upon the heart that mourned for the lost baby boy. Since then seven years had passed, and today, as Mrs. Maurice caressed Marcia's lace christening robe, she put aside all that pertained to the girl's disobedience and elopement, and memory dwelt only upon the sunny time when her husband and daughter made home a heaven. Into the quiet room crept the whine of a dog scratching at the door. As she opened it, a feeble brown creature crossed the floor, crouched before the hearth, and, raising soft, tender eyes to the portrait of the general, barked once and beat the carpet with his tail, as if in salute; her husband's favorite pointer Hector, failing fast, but loyal and true as the as if in salute; her husband's favorite pointer Hector, failing fast, but loyal and true as the heart of his widow.

clash jarred the perfect harmony. As the dead years babbled, she listened now to echoes of manly tones, and now to a baby's prattling lisp, still dividing as of yore her heart's homage. When war robbed her of the husband who had never ceased to be tender lover, her only hold on life centered in their beautiful daughter Marcia, and the struggle to guard her and defend from confiscation and ruin the fine and defend from confiscation and ruin the fine landed estate and large fortune left by General Maurice had served, in some degree, to lessen the tendency to morbid brooding.

pled and ruined South.

No mourning Southern matron indulged more intensely an inexorable, passionate hatred of Northern invaders than did Mrs. Maurice, who refused to accept the inevitable, and shut her doors against agents of "union and reconstruction" as promptly as she would have barred out leprosy or smallpox.

Proud of the social prestige with which her Brahmin birth and stainless family record had dowered her, she wielded her influence in uncompromising hostility to all who advocated a tacit acceptance of the new conditions called "peace." The loss of negroes that abandoned several plantations would have materially impaired the Maurice fortune, had not the prevision of the general's commission merchant in a distant seaport induced the precautionary course of sending a portion of his crop of cotin a distant seaport induced the precautionary course of sending a portion of his crop of cotton to Liverpool early in the first year of the war, thus securing a large amount of treasure under the British flag, where (as the cotton factor wrote Mrs. Maurice a few years later) "Union" thieves could not steal, nor 'reconstruction' moths and rust feed upon it." blinds to allow sunlight entrance into this silent reliquary filled with mementos jealously guarded "in solemn salvatory"; a heavy, square bedstead with twisted columns that upheld a red-lined tester whence embroidered draperies fell; a gilded swinging wicker crib, Minerva, you will finish packing Miss Marcia's trunk, which must be sent to her. I shall make no change in my plans, except to take the noon train instead of the one at midnight. Ask me no questions. Send Mitchell and Eliza to me."

When her attorney, Mr. Whitfield, appalled by the stony white face that showed no hint of tears, no more trace of grief than the marble figure that supported the mantel at her side, essayed a few words of sympathy, she put out her hands with an imperious gesture.

put out her hands with an imperious gesture.

"There is no comfort possible, and I need your help only in writing a new will. I start to New York at noon, so you have little time."

A few hours later, having seen only her pastor and her lawyer, she left her rifled home, by a route that enabled her to avoid the town designated as a place of meeting. Across the girl's farewell letter, which was returned to "Marcia Maurice," she had written: "My only hope is that God will take me out of this world before I see again the face of the child who has disgraced the memory of her father and the name of her mother."

Eighteen months had been spent in Europe, whence she was most reluctantly recalled by the death of Robert Mitchell, the overseer and business manager of one of her plantations, who was killed by the explosion of a mill engine. His young widow, Eliza, had been sheltered and guarded in Mrs. Maurice's home when orphaned by the death of her father, a Methodist chaplain attached to General Maurice's command and the intimacy of years Methodist chapiain attached to General Maurice's command, and the intimacy of years was marked by unfailing kindness and confidence on the part of the benefactress, by profound affection and ardent gratitude on that of the destitute girl. The peculiarly harrowing circumstantes attending her husband's loss had so severely shocked Eliza that Mrs. Maurice promptly removed her from the

CHAPTER II.

"IT IS LIKE HAVING TWO GODS."

Sharing in some degree that infallible instinct whereby lower animals interpret the character of their owners, young children are often as wise and wary as dogs and cats, and before Eglah could walk without clinging to Eliza's finger, she knew intuitively that her silent, watchful grandmother eyed her suspiciously, and that warm caresses could be expected only from her father and her young foster-mother. Profound and regretful compassion rather than tenderness filled Mrs. Maurice's heart, and she faithfully ministered to the infant's needs, as she would have pityingly warmed and fed some bleating lamb bereft of its dam by March snows. Since the little girl showed, except in form, no faintest trace of Maurice blood, her grandmother regarded her most sorrowfully—not as Marcia's baby, but as the living monument of a cruel and unpardonable injury inflicted by Judge Kent. Even in the cradle Eglah defied an authority supreme in the household.

"You must not say Lila, but Mama-Eliza."

"I won't! It hurths my tongue to say Elitha. I will say Ma-Lila."

"I won't! It hurths my tongue to say Elitha. I will say Ma-Lila."

The child's inherent antagonism made her a vexing embodiment of protest, an obstinate interrogation point punctuating the commands of this old-fashioned lady whose domestic canons belonged to an era when boys and girls were not considered "servile" because trained to answer their elders "No, sir." or "Yes, ma'am." and when after a meal in the sunset glow young human broods followed feathered folk to an early rest before stars spangled the sky. If among General Maurice's choice collection of thoroughbreadsh, had appeared an uncouth mongrel pullet, dust-colored and blue of skin, his exacting widow would not have rejected it more summarily than did her proud soul repudiate the Kent scion whom she housed luxuriously because of Marcia's than to fondle the bullet that slew her husband. Judge Kent's official duties called him often from the city, and during his visits to his child mis. HIS month we give our readers a few of the many novel and useful articles which came in response to our prize offer.

Although it is rather early to think of Christmas you will find some of the things useful and attractive to make up ahead for little presents for the holidays.

In this contest considerable originality was displayed and cleverly worked out. An extremely neat and nicely made article was the

Barrel-shaped Hat-pin Holder sent in by Miss Ivy Chew.

This can be made of cardboard covered with silk or any smooth, firm material, and consists of seventeen pieces.

For the bottom cut a circle of cardboard two inches in diameter; from the silk cut two circles, one exactly the size of the cardboard one, the other considerably larger. With the larger circle cover the cardboard smoothly on the outside, drawing the extra fullness in little plaits on the inside and securely baste; then stitch the smaller circle on the inside as a lining, first pinning it around to fit, and turning in the raw edges as you stitch.

For the staves cut sixteen pieces of cardboard four and one half inches long, five eighths of of an inch wide at the middle and sloping to three eighths of an inch wide at both ends. Cover these with material, cut and stitched the same way as the bottom was covered. When all are neatly covered commence to sew the staves together by overseaming the edges on the wrong side. As you finish sewing each stave to the others, turn it, so the bulge will always be on the outside. Of course when they are all joined it will be found necessary to sew the last to the first on the outside or right side, first on the outside or right side, this makes the barrel round. Now sew the bottom on by each strip twice, so that the raw edges just meet together, catch-stitch the edges smoothly together so you will have a flat hoop one quarter of an inch wide. Carefully blind-stitch one at the top of the barrel, one at the bottom and the other two at equal distances apart around the middle.

Now the barrel is completed fill it partly with emery or very clean dry sand. This will form a ballast so the heavy-headed hat-pins won't upset it; also preserving their points from rust and blunting.

These barrels can be made of very small scraps of material, in fact from pieces too small to be utilized for anything else, and any old discarded pasteboard box may be used for the foundation. They are attractive made of any color, but of course look more realistic made of light-brown or natural wood color. Nearly everyone has some scraps of linings that would make one. Sew them with strong silk or thread that exactly matches the shade of the material used. They will be found more convenient and durable to use than the glass tubes that were so popular last Christmas. that were so popular last Christmas.

I make tea-towels, kitchen aprons and pillow slips for the men's beds and last spring I made six pillow slips with four-inch ruffles all around them. I got a package each of pink, Turkey-red and yellow diamond dyes for cotton and dyed two of the slips with each color. I use them upon the three pillows on the couch in the living-room, and wash one set each week. They are cheerful looking, inexpensive and clean.

When my light cotton dresses and shirt-waists get faded out (as they will in time, for the water is so hard that I have to use lye), I dye them with fast dyes for cotton and have new garments.

Do you all know that a mitten made of velvet or a small cushion of the same with a strap to slip the hand through is the best thing to clean dust from your silk skirts? Just try it once and you will never again use a whisk broom or a

Instead of putting a paper bag over your lamp chimneys to keep out the dust, make a covering of crepe paper that will fit the chimney and where the paper is drawn up at the top pull it out to form a ruffle and fasten a tiny bunch of paper flowers in the center.

This is one of the finest places which is still thinly settled, the climate is ideal, very healthy, a good place for poultry or crops. Here the Poultry raisers may find the following of value:

To rid hen nests of mites sprinkle tobacco into them, the stronger the better.
To rid a setting hen of mites pour boiling water over a couple of handfuls of tobacco and add a few drops of carbolic acid and wash the hens where the mites seem to be the thickest.
For any kind of bowel trouble in chickens try a few drops of castor-oil and turpentine mixed; this is an experiment of my own which proved a success. Mrs. Julia Musgrovz, Bussey, ia.

An Illinois sister writes as follows:

I have decided to make myself known in this corner, as I can be a silent reader no longer. My father was a Methodist minister and well known in Mo. Ky., Tenn. and ril. He died when I was eight years old and I have only a vague memory of him. Mother lived for twenty years after father died, and then passed away very suddenly one Easter morning, from paralysis. Easter is always a sad occasion for me, and more than once I have spent the day in tears and sadness.

I have a dear baby boy fifteen months old, who takes away some of the sad thoughts from my mind. He is the light and joy of my heart. I am sure you will all agree with me that no home is complete without a baby.

For sometime I have allowed myself to worry and fret, but I've turned over a new leaf for the remainder of this year. I'm trying to keep this in mind, this thought;

"If we trust, we do not worry,
If we worry we do not trust."

If we worry we do not trust."

Now, sisters, isn't this true?

What a great responsibility we mothers have in trying to bring up our children in the true way. We should be so careful to teach them that though they may do and say evil things, unknown to us, there's one who sees all things. And we cannot begin too early.

My dear mother died when I was but ten years old, but those sweet preclous lessons she taught me, I cherish them in my memory still!

really don't belong. Those who have never been to New York City, have missed a great deal, it being called the greatest city on earth. Although New Yorkers call their city 'the only town on earth,' yet in the summer, they can be seen, one by one sneaking off to some country spot and glad to get away from 'the only town.' It is also called the wickedest city. Yet when the needy call, they are answered, as we must not forget that our Helen Gould lives here, and many others similar.

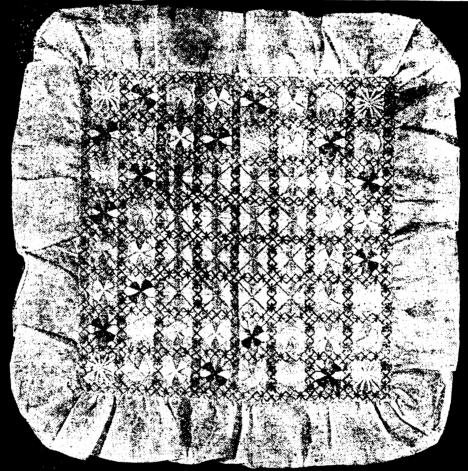

"In the house where we moved I found a copy of 'Comfort'. I sent for another one and received one of Nov. '06. I was very much surprised at its price on account of its reading matter. I take a few of New York's best magazines and I know that 'Comfort' can compete with them any time although it costs one third the price they do. One thing, it goes ahead of them in this way. When turning over the pages, I intended to dodge the 'cooking recipe page;' but to my surprise there was none. Only a few recipes I did find, which were no doubt true and tried by their owners. Something else I found very good in 'Comfort'. Among the sisters' letters, they tell how to do fancy work, give good ideas about the house, also good medical remedies. The few I have tried are excellent. Mrs. Burris's hair remedy given in Nov. '06 is surely first class, and used in the South where women are noted for their beautiful hair.

"Here is one of my ideas; which though it isn't great, at times proves useful. I get blank books, into which I paste different remedies I find in the newspapers, etc. One book is called the 'House Doctor,' another 'Household Ideas.' The Cook,' and another 'Lace.' My lace book is made of cloth and crocheted lace samples are sewed in. I have also an account-book. I will try to remember the 'shut-ins' with books, letters and other things if possible. A grateful sister writes to thank all who remembered her in any way, and sends this information in regard to Montana, as so many asked about the climate, etc:

"Many people think Montana is very cold, but we do not find it any colder than New York State. In the winter snow is not deep where we are; we have good sleighing up in the mountains, but down in the Ruby Valley they scarcely ever have more than two inches of snow; last winter was an exception, and they had to feed their stock about two months. In the summer the sun shines nearly all the time. It's lovely in the shade, and the nights are always cool. The air is dry and light and has been the means of restoring my health, which was poor. When I came here I could not walk across the street alone, but not more than two weeks after I came, I could walk to the top of the foothills; and two years later I weighed more than I ever did in my life.

Many mothers, of whom I know make this mistake: when a child comes for a kiss or with a question, they turn them off and say, 'I am too busy, run along.' I never do it and I know of one poor mother who will never cease to regret having refused her darling a kiss.

"She was busy making him a suit to wear to a pienic the next day. When he came in and said, 'Mamma, I love you, I want to kiss you,' she answered, 'I have no time just now, I am very busy.' He ran out with the other children, but in a few minutes, amid a confusion of voices, she heard her name called and running out, saw her baby had fallen into a pool of water. He went down for the last time calling for her, before assistance arrived. So many times she has said, heartbrokenly, 'Oh, if I had only kissed him!"

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Let me try to interest you all by telling how twelve hens fed me for three months, almost without any other pecuniary help. They commenced to lay on Jan. 16th, and on Apr. 16th of this year they had laid 508 eggs. Their feed was some spoiled corn with a mash of meal and corn. Bran once a week. Fresh water was always provided. They ranged in a wood and roosted on a rall fence. I had built them a henbouse, but they never would roost in it, a leaky roof was no doubt the reason. I am always providing new nests, and they like this habit of mine, and keep free from vermin. Of course I am not able to have pate de fois gras very often, or venison more than every other day, but the quantity of eggs I get kept the wolf a long distance from the door.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Gene Warfield asks himself why a woman of Mrs. Rosslyn's Puritanic strength of character should embrace the Catholic faith. "Is it for this I am to be separated from the object of my dearest desire?" The sound of voices chanting the Ave Maria is borne to his waiting ears. Theta Rosslyn meets her lover. There is an opening for him in the West in Judge Blodgett's office. He will win wealth and fame, and coming back make Theta his wife. As he pleads he sees a small chain about Theta's neck, and asks what talisman is hiding there. Pulling at the shain he finds a tiny gold crucifix; he snaps the chain and dashes the crucifix to the ground. With a cry like a wounded animal, she catches the crucifix to her breast. "God forgive me, if even for a little while I let your love words deceive me into forgetting the depth of the gulf which lies between us." Gene pleads with all the fervor of youth, but the girl dare not yield, and his pride battles with the anguish which kills the soul, though the body yet lives.

Gene finds his mother waiting and she tries to comfort him. He feels all is lost save ambition. Gently the mother chidea him. Ambition will never make him happy. The parting comes; the mother chides him. Can be suffered in the would be so herd." It has care of him."

The legal battle in which he is engaged seems like a hopeless undertaking. He will fight until they crush him. The Judge sees young men as able as he caught between the upper and nether milistone, the Trusts, and he hopes Gene will feel his way carefully. It isn't the Trusts, but the brains which conceive them, the stupendous power summed by in one word, Corcoran. Gene promises to go to the reception given in honor of Mrs. Haston's sister-in-law and her daughter, Miss Victoria Moore, of Washington, D. C. He rides out of town and across the open prairie. A horse and its rider come into Warfield's range of vision. There is a misstep and horse and rider fail. Gene rushes to the sport—the ridder is unhurt. The horse is badl Warfield's speech, and realizes he is bought. Warfield asks himself will he ever be able to clasp the hand of an honest man again. He goes to Victoria. Will she be his wife?

Mrs. Warfield receives a letter from Gene. There is something about it which worries her. Mrs. Rosslyn asks for the priest and bids Theta go to walk. She has much to say to him. As Theta stands alone old memories stir within her. She sees Gene; the figure of a lovely woman is near him. Her hands clutch at her breast and in agony she cries, "My God! He is married!" and she falls in a faint. A long sickness follows, and when she recovers she finds her mother sieeping in the churchyard. Gene hopes for a home of his own and pictures it to his wife. Victoria wishes for an apartment house where all is done by trained servants. Can they afford it? He has no income outside of his official salary. He will not touch a penny that does not rightfully belong to him. They return to Washington, and visit the house Victoria determines shall be their home. Gene stops in the library and falls to musing. He sees a picture. A room with softly tinted walls—a woman whose fingers fashlon white garments, crooning a low soft melody. After a time the prattle of a child fills the room and a boy climbs on his knee, and he feels the clinging of baby arms. Again the woman croons and the cradle rocks and a baby girl looks at Gene. Victoria rouses him from his reverie—he hasn't seen half the rooms. He fails to find a nursery.

Four months later and Victoria is surprised by a call from Corcoran. He searches for his ideal and finds it too late. Victoria begg of him not to play with her—he knows what fire is when beyond control. Gene enters unsuspiciously yet with a repugnance toward Corcoran. Victoria leaves them to discuss business. The months that follow are trying ones. There is borse the cry of a child—a little boy—and Gene looks down with wonder and she discharges her, and from that hour the baby droops.

Congress closes and the Warfields spend the summer at a fashlon

THE AWAKENING.

HE bill is infamous." Warfield's voice was caim, his face white and the sensitive lips quivered.
Corcoran, cool, calm and commanding, gave a shrug of his passes, it matters little what title you give it."

"Corcoran," Gene went on, "you understand what the passage of this bill means to my constituents, to the American people. I have done your bilding—I have been your willing tool in all things—and now you ask me to consummate my villainy toward the honest men who elected me by giving support to this—I repeat—this infamous bill."

Again Corcoran shrugged his shoulders, an evil smile playing about his lips.

"I not only ask it but I demand it. Call it what you will, this measure yet remains as the consummation of the plans of my lifetime: it what you will, this measure yet remains as the consummation of the plans of my lifetime: it what you will, this measure yet remains as the consummation of the plans of my lifetime: it what you will, this measure yet remains as the consummation of the plans of my lifetime: it what you will, this measure yet remains as the consummation of the plans of my lifetime: it what you will, this measure yet remains as the consummation of the plans of my lifetime: it what you will, this measure yet remains as the consummation of the plans of my lifetime: it what you will, this measure yet remains as the consummation of the plans of my dashes it to the floor. good your promises. You have done my bidding, and I thank you for your obedience. I have kept every promise I made to you. I have done more. I have given you repeated opportunities to make money and these you have chosen to refuse. Some whisper of the state of your finances has been borne to me—" he paused to note the effect of this. Gene winced. A few days before the knowledge of Victoria's extravagance had descended upon him in the shape of an avalanche of bills, and these he had paid although it had taken the last dollar he possessed. He made no reply to Corcoran's last words.

"I understand how matters are with you financially, Warfield, and I promise for the safe passage of this bill—which means so much to me personally—a hundred thousand dollars of Harvester Trust Stock shall be yours. Also, a higher place awaits you. The Senate—"
"Here's a pretty how-de-do, Gene," interrupted a genial voice, as a short, pudgy figure pushed itself into the room. "I told that fellow out there in the swallow-tail that if I'd got to be announced like some eastern potentate—"
"Judge Blodgett!" Gene, glad in his soul for the interruption, advanced with outstretched hand. "This is certainly good of you. You have, I believe, met Mr. Corcoran before?"
"I have had the honor," the judge replied ironically.

Corcoran bowed coldly. The two had met frequently in Excelsior but no friendship existed between them.

"I hoped for a few more words in private," Corcoran said eying the judge askance.
"Anything you care to add may be said in the presence of my old friend," Gene replied proudly.
"As you please," rejoined the boss with a sneer. "It is only this: I shall look for a strong speech in support of the bill when it

"Anything you care to add may be said in the presence of my old friend," Gene replied proudly.

"As you please," rejoined the boss with a sneer. "It is only this: I shall look for a strong speech in support of the bill when it comes up tomorrow." For a full minute he looked fixedly at Warfield, who returned his stare with interest, while the judge, hands in his pockets, looked out the window, them with an abrupt, "Good day," Corcoran stalked out.

"Every man has his price," he reflected sagely, "and I offered him a good one. It is worth it. The passage of this bill will crown the ambitions of my life—to fail in this is to fail in all. But I shall not fail. I must put the finish to that other matter, too. I wouldn't have believed it possible that any woman could have—and I—I am mad with impatience." As these thoughts passed through his mind he pushed open the great bronze door and entered his automobile. "Ugh:" exclaimed the judge, making a wry face, "I'm giad that man is gone. Makes me think of his Satanic Majesty. But what on carth," he broke off, laying his hands on Gene's sheulders and twisting his around toward the light, "have you been doing to yourself? You look ten years older and the hair on your temples is as white as cotton."

A short dry laugh broke from Warfield.

"When a man preempts a quarter section in purgatory you'd expect his hair to turn white, wouldn't you, judge?"

"By the looks of you, I should imagine you had been living in the territory further on. But I like that idea of purgatory—that sort of half way place where a man can always turn back if he wants to. Look here, Warfield," dropping the half bantering tone with which he began and growing serious, "are you going to obey Corcoran? I couldn't help hearing a part of what he was saying and I want to know whether or not you are going to support that measure tomorrow?"

Warfield's face was a picture of indecision.

"L'pon my soul," he said slowly, "I can't tell warfield's face was a picture of indecision.

"Upon my soul," he said slowly, "I can't tell you."
The judge came close and laid a hand on the younger man's shoulder in an affectionate way.
"By your own confession, Gene, you haven't found this life as happy as you expected?"
"Happy!" Gene uttered the word mockingly.
"I have suffered all the tortures I deserve. My soul has been steeped in infamy—the child I worship is being sacrificed on the altar of felly my wife.

"I have suffered all the fortures I deserve.
"Ambition then was not worth the price you paid for it?" the judge asked gently.
"No, no a thousand times!" The answer was torn from Gene.
"My boy," the judge continued, "there is a turning point in every man's life, a time when he must choose between good and evil. Once you made a choice that I advised against and it falled to bring you happiness. Warfield," he went on, with, for prosaic old Judge Blodgett, a queer sort of quaver in his voice, "I am not a praying man—as you know, I have never believed much in the efficacy of prayer—and yet I wish all the prayers your old mother has uttered for you could have reached out to the Great Spirit in the Unknown and that today that Presence was watching over you. And Gene," something between a chuckle and a sob in his tone, "I want you to remember that there is more rejoicing over one sinner that repents than over ninety-nine just persons." As he uttered the last word he made a break for the door.
"What!" exclaimed Gene, "you are not going so soon?"
"Yes, I promised Mrs. Blodgett I'd get back to attend a matinee with her this afternoon and it is pretty nearly the hour now. Remember, Gene," he held up a warning finger, "we will be up there in the gallery tomorrow—Mrs. Blodgett and I—and we will be listening to every word you say." He went out closing the door behind him.

Warfield, still with that look of indecision on

"Mr. Speaker, I rise to the privilege of speaking against the passage of this measure."

There was a hasty consultation a few seats from where he stood. Messengers were dispatched to the lobbies and cloak rooms.

"It has been understood my remarks upon this bill would favor its passage and so they would have, but for the awakening of a conscience long sleeping. Before I speak directly to this measure, I ask the privilege of my colleagues to make a statement; I fear it will be more of a confession."

The assembly hall was fast filling. Indifferent members were taking their seats and exciting efforts were displayed by the members who had promised the trust a safe passage of the bill.

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, a few years ago I was an unknown lawyer of the West struggling for existence and endeavoring to satisfy an unquenchable ambition. This morning, I realize what that ambition has cost and it is not satisfied.

"Through the backing of this great corporation I have risen in polities, I am permitted to sit at the desk before me, I am honored as a member of this the greatest American law-making body. The ambition is no more satisfied than the drunkard's craving thirst. I have fed it all I could obtain. I have sacrificed not only my honor but the welfare of those whose condences I hold, and for what? That I might live in grandeur, that I might associate with the idle non-producing class who dwell in luxury, and laugh at necessity!" he exclaimed dramatically.

idle non-producing class who dwell in luxury, and laugh at necessity!" he exclaimed dramatically.

"I have not been bought," and his arms went straight up pointing to the magnificent paintings in the celling, his eyes now turned to catch the light coming in the windows above.

"I have not been bought, oh! God, no! And yet, I have. I have not handled their money but I have been bought. I have drunk their wine, I have been entertained at their expense. It was their money that furnished the campaign fund to elect me. Slowly I have receded from my ideals. Not once, but many times, I have bid my sense of duty, be still. I have strangled my better self until I am nothing. The taste of this slow poison has been sweet, but its ruin sure.

"While walking my room last night I took stock of my moral nature: and this morning in a spirit of deepest humility, I declare myself a moral bankrupt. I find the old convictions are all gone: the beautiful ideals of youth call back from distance. I am here in liesh and with voice, but while I speak over yonder is taking place a hurried consultation among other moral bankrupts to still further carry out the wishes of their masters."

His lips were parched. Raising a cool glass of pure water, he drank deeply. A quiet breeze blew in from across the botanical gardens, cooling his fevered brow. It seemed to him the breath of freedom.

His lips were parched. Raising a cool glass of pure water, he drank deeply. A quiet breeze bew in from across the botanical gardens, cooling his fevered brow. It seemed to him the breath of freedom.

A member was trying to get the floor.

"Mr. Speaker, I will not yield. Gentlemen of this assembly I must not yield to any man until I have set myself right with those honest men who elected me; right with the whole world.

"It is not enough that I make this body my confessor; I must use my remaining strength to right, so far as it lies in my power, the wrongs not yet complete. This bill must not pass. Those people who elected me must not be further denied their rights. Those simple people living as all should live, drawing their inspirations from nature's rugged bosom and craving no greater luxury than the dying sunset, they have trusted me. I have betrayed that trust while my conscience was drugged with false standards. The press has lauded me, corporation money and influence have hired my praises sung, but the music of honest praise has never souded in my ears. I am not alone, other throats.

The gavel sounded harshly and the chair announced the speaker might proceed.

"Mr. Speaker. I will not add the infamy of dragging down other characters. Let each one here, by the franchise of the people, answer to his conscience and to his constituents as I am answering. Their consciences will awake as mine has done. When that awakening comes, and it will come; when the great common people are finally aroused, no government can permanently endure which does not provide equally for the peace, prosperity and welfare of all its people. As Tolstol says: "Mothers will teach their sons that all men are brothers, and that the only enemy they have is the man who wants to rule and exploit them, then we will have the women the world needs—who will raise sons with a higher manhood than the world has ever known. When those men a faint applause and free from the galleries came a faint applause and free from the galleries came a faint app

His hand sought his vest pocket and brought forth the watch his mother had given him. He wished to know how many more minutes he could speak. As the case opened he caught his mother's picture. Then replacing the timepiece, he continued:

"But it will not, it cannot mean the scorn of the mother who gave me birth; it will not mean the distrust of those who have loved me and prayed that my manhood be preserved, while surrounded by this seething whirlpool of temptation. It will not mean a farther distance between myself and my ideals, between ambition and honor; it will not mean nightmares with hollow-eyed children and half clad men and women. It will not mean, it cannot mean the further sacrifice of everything that is good and pure and true. If defeat it is, I welcome it and with it the peace of right and justice which can come only where honor is the judge in dealings between men."

emotions, Corcoran listened until the last ecnoes of appliause following Warfield's speech died away, then, despite his strong anger, an expression of reluctant admiration was forced from him.

"There go the hopes of a lifetime," he thought, "shattered to fragments by the breath of one man. I have failed just when success was in my grasp and all my schemes end in the nothingness from whence they came. I ought to hate Warfield and yet I cannot. 'Every man has his price.' I said in my soul, but I reckoned without something that has a still higher price—conscience. That intangible thing which I myself once possessed and with my own hand crushed. Yet to me it was Aladdin's lamp and owning it, all good things were mine. And today could I possess it I would give all my world has ever yielded me."

People were rapidly leaving the gallerles and Corcoran was on the point of following when a light touch was laid on his arm and turning he encountered the startled gaze of Victoria.

"I can't understand it, Corcoran replied with a characteristic shrug of his huge shoulders, "and he holds all the winning cards. As for me it has come to a show-down and I don't hold even a pair of deuces. But wait—wait till he goes back to the West to stand for re-election. Out there I'll beat him—yes—if in doing it I send my soul to perdition!" A look so dark and intreatening came over his face as he spoke, a little child glancing up in passing shrank away in affright.

Wictoria heard the threat and there struggled into her consciousness a thought of Warfield's unfailing kindness to herself, of all he had borne from her and a feeling akin to pity stole into her heart. She came close to Corcoran and looked up at him appealingly.

"Would you not spare him, Michael—for my sake?" she asked softly.

The softened look on her proud face made victoria very heautiful and as Corcoran's eyes ran over the curves of her perfect figure, coming back to the lovely lips with their brilliant coloring, he bent nearer, devouring her with his gance.

"Would I spa

ind she looked any hadministrely with a silent mod of her head. A smile lit up his rugged face.

"I know the state of Warfield's finances, and I know also you love pretty things." As he spoke he pulled out a check book and wrote something in a quick nervous hand, tore it out and handed it to her.

Victoria looked down at the paper in her hand, saw it was a check made payable to her, and a sudden wave of shame swept over her. When she again looked up at him the tears were standing in her big eyes.

"Heavens, how you insult me! I love you—because I can no longer resist—but I cannot —cannot take it." And with the gesture of an offended queen she thrust the check back upon him.

cannot take it." And with the gesture of an offended queen she thrust the check back upon him.

Something in her action, but more in the sight of those tears, stirred the depths of the man's dark soul.

"Victoria," he cried impetuously, "I wish my wife were dead and you divorced that I might marry you tomorrow."

She smiled, for the words pleased her.

"Look, Michael," she said, "all the people have gone and there is my maid looking for me. I must say good by."

"Good by," he whispered softly.

Then she left him.

As Corcoran looked after her retreating form suddenly the glamour faded snd an intense disgust for all he had done, for all that he purposed doing, came over him.

"And for that little pinch of rose-colored dust a man would peril his soul," he thought. "How damnable is my act. If there be a hell it yawns for such men as I, and yet how deeply she must love me—that woman who is willing to throw away the love of such a man as Warfield —for me. But away with these thoughts of morality."

Corcoran was in the act of stepping into his automobile when a mesenger boy reached his articulation when a messenger boy reached his side.

He broke the seal and read:
"Your wife is dead. Come at once."
"So," he muttered as he thrust the despatch into his pocket and hastily pulled out a timetable, "one wish has come true. Let me see—there is a train I can get within an hour and another that goes at seven in the morning. No one knows of this—and I think I will wait and take the morning train. My nerves are all unstrung and I need an hour or two of sleep before I meet her tonight. Well, the cocaine bottle will yield me that—blessed cocaine."

fore I meet her tonight. Well, the cocaine bottle will yield me that—blessed cocaine."

When Warfield reached home the nurse met him with a grave face. Startled, his first thought was of his child.

"The baby?" he cried.

The woman regarded him silently for a moment. During the months she had spent in the Warfield household her sympathies had gone over to the side of Gene and as much as one of her cold nature could, she pitied him.

"The child is much worse, but there is no immediate fear of ueath unless a sudden change should take place. It is now in a stupor and may continue so for hours."

Gene reeled, the words struck him with the suddenness of a blow. Regaining control of himself he hastened to the bedside of the little one. As he looked at the tiny face in an agony of fear the nurse said gently:

"Mr. Warfield, there is really nothing you can do here, and you were up all last night. Go and take a few hours rest and if there is any change I will call you."

"I cannot bear the thought of leaving him."

"Believe me, it is best." Gene yielded at length to her importunities, but before retiring to refresh his brain with long delayed sleep he wrote a letter to someone up in the hills of New Hampshire and two days later when it was received and read and re-read aloud to Uncle John, there was a new struggle raging in the heart of the one who had read it and a prayer of thanksgiving eame from the lips of the mother too deep for mortal understanding.

The letter written, Gene threw himself fully dressed on a couch in the library and fell instantly into a dreamless sieep.

From this he was suddenly awakened by a snatch of gay opera music and Victoria in full evening costume entered. As Gene sprang up she gave him a startled glance.

"I didn't know—I didn't expect to find you her," she said in some confusion.

He stretched out his hands pleadingly.

"Victoria, our child is alarmingly ill—will you not remain at home this evening."

The confusion of her manner deepened and fush rose to her face.

TRUST you are all keeping cool. If not I can give you an excellent recipe for overheated blood. Jump into a sixty foot river and pull the river in after you. Stay submerged for six months, and if at that time you have not cooled off sufficiently, apply icebergs to the heated spots, untit they are reduced to the correct temperature for perfect comfort.

You will be glad to know that Lawrence Bird of Dalton, Ga., for whom I made an appeal in our December issue, received $85.00 in cash, 450 letters, and many useful articles. Lawrence has got his cow and now not only has milk and butter in abundance, but has some of each to sell. The cow cost $30.00, so he still has a comfortable balance left after adding Mrs. Cow to his family. The poor fellow's health has improved now that he has better nourishment, and he wants me to thank you on behalf of himself and poor old mother, for all you have done for him, and I am sure I am only too glad to do it. God bless you all! What a blessed thing it is that we are able to do this good work, and just think of the happiness and the real substantial help we are able to give to these yoor suffering souls. It is just as easy to do good as to do ill, if you only get the habit. There are probably 10,000 of the 20,000 members in the C. L. O. C. who have done for others, and the actual doing and giving is left to about one thousand of our members, good-hearted souls, the sall of the earth, God's elect. Though I am handing bouquets to you all, and I am proud of what we have done and are doing, still it is only a trifie to what we might do, if you'd all get the habit of doing one deed of mercy, one act of kindness every month, instead of leaving it to the few.

I like you to know results. The world is interested, not in what people are going to do, but what they do. You have saved Lawrence lift and his mother's life, and brought happi-

Very few of you are working to secure "Uncle Charlie's Poems." I did not think there was a single member in the League, that would not break his (or her) neck to earn this book, by getting seven 15 cent subscriptions for COMFORT. One hour's easy work will do the trick. Can't you spare that hour? My birthday is on September 5th, next month. You usually want to know whether I'd prefer a steam yacht or an automobile for a present, and in the generosity of your hearts, not knowing which I would like best, you send me both. Now cut out the yacht and automobile this year. I have seven hundred steam yachts sailing around out in the wood pile already, and we have canned automobiles for lunch twice a day. So, my dears, let up on these expensive gifts, and instead just bustle around and get seven new subscriptions to COMFORT to earn that book of poems. If you will do that we will have 100,000 more members in the COMFORT family, and I will have the happiest birthday of my life.

GUM NECK, TYBRELL CO., N. C., May 17, 1907.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE AND COUSINS:

I am ninetween, five feet, nine inches in height, weigh one hundred and thirty-seven pounds and have golden hair and blue eyes.

I live in the eastern part of North Carolina, my father is a farmer, and farming is my occupation when not at school. I live in Tyrrell County just eighteen miles southeast of Columbia, which is the county seat, and it is a very beautiful little town, situated on the Scuppernong river. It has about six houndred and fifty inhabants, and is a great lumber manufacturing town. The county officials erected a Court House at Columbia that cost $13,000 it is a credit to the county. Gum Neck is a township of about four houndred and sixty-five inhabants, and is situated on the Aligator River. We have two steam mills, that do the farmers grinding, gining and sawing. We have six stores and four new churches.

Gum Neck is one of the most important agricultural sections of the eastern part of this state. The principal crops are corn, cotton, peanuts, oats, sorghun, soja beans, Irish and sweet potatoes. All kinds of vegetables thrive well here. Butter, poultry and eggs are also a specialty with the farmers of this place. Apples, pears, plums, peaches and scuppernong grapes are the principal fruits. Berries are abundant. Hickory, hazel and walnuts are found on many of the farms. The rivers and creeks abound with shad, rock herring, trout, perch and eels. Partridges, doves, and rabbits furnish sport for the hunters. Bears, dears, oposums, coons and squirels, are seen in our woods and they are shot quite frequently. Uncle, if you should ever come down to visit me at Gum Neck I will take you down the Aligator river some moonlight night bear hounting in my boat, and we will have some fun with Mr. Bear; that is fi you like that kind of sport.

I shall be glad to hear from all the cousins especially those of the gentler sex and now God bless you all. Your loving neph the dears, but it is murder in the first degree if you are caught shooting one. However you Gum Neckers can have the hardihood to injure the coy darlings of the opposite sex beats me. I stabbed one once with a loving glance, and got my face pushed in for my audacity, but I never went so far as to shoot one with a real bullet. You propose to take me down the Alligator river some night "hounting" bear. I don't know what "hounting" bear is, but if it means plugging lead into Bruin's pyjamas I want you to excuse me right here. I have lost no bear, and therefore have no desire to hunt or "hount" for any. And you don't fool me into taking any moonlight trips on the Aligator river either. I am a soft thing, and an easy mark, but you can't hand me a lemon of that variety. I can see you getting next to my roll of masumas, divesting me of my one sock and a half an undervest, and then feeding my defunct carcase to the 'gators. Millard, you can spring t.at bear hount on some of the Gum Neck inhabants, but you can't get me into a deal of that kind in a million years. No, Siree!

MONMOUTH, IA., May 15, 1907.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I wonder if you will admit an Iowa girl into your charming circle. I have been enjoying the cousins' chatty letters and Uncle's bright, witty replies for some time and decided I should like to join the C. L. O. C. too, so here I am.

I will describe myself so vou'll know who you're looking at. I am seventeen vears old, five feet four inches tall, tip the beam at one hundred and fifteen pounds, have light hair, light complexion and blue eyes.

I am now keeping house for my father, my mother is dead, I have kept house ever since I was thirteen and have taken care of a baby brother for two years. I have lived in lowa all my life, with the exception of two years which I spent in Marysville, Kansas.

My cousin and myself visited the State Penistiution and saw the prisoners at work. We also went to Sabbath-school. No one but the prisoners take part in this. They march into the chapel and with every ten prisoners there is one guard, of course they don't all come, they can take their choice of going to S. S. or to their cells.

There are only twelve women in the "pen" now, and only one of them is in for life.

It makes a person feel sorry for some of them, but of course it's their own fault that they are there.

As this is the first letter I've written, I'll try and not make it too long, so will close with love to all the cousins and remain as ever your loving niece.

Mary, I want you to know that your taking care of your baby brother, and taking

"You are trying to be funny, young man, ten dollars or ten days." I said "I'll take the money if you have no objection." I did not get the money but I got the days, and I have been dazed ever since. They hustled me off to the tennypentiary, and gave me the first bath I had had in seven hundred and forty years. After the bath it took three convicts ten years to remove the real estate that had been jarred loose from my hide during the operation. The warden said he would rather dig the Panama and the Panapa Canals twice over, than scrub me once, and so would I. They had a rule in that prison that every man had to follow the same business and profession in jail as he did outside. Men that were bricklayers were put to laying bricks and so on. Authors were put to writing books. When they asked me what my business was I said "Will you put me to doing the same work here, that I did outside?" "Sure," said the keeper, "that's the rule of the institution, and the rules here must be strictly observed." "wee whiz," said I, "I am glad to hear it." When they asked me what my business had been, I said, "Traveling salesman." "All right," said the warden, "you can travel to your cell!" That is where I murmured "Stung!" Penitentiaries are bad places to get into. Some people are used to being behind the bars, and like it, but as I am a strictly temperate man, and never drink anything stronger than beiled lye and carbelic acid, it is against my religion to be put behind the bars, as I think it is a barbarous practice. Boys and girls, keep away from the pens, no matter whether they are hog pens, prison pens, or fountain pens, they are tough propositions to stack up against.

Sterling City, Tex., April 4, 1907.

Dear Uncle Charlie:

On March 2nd, the Death Angel entered our home, and bore from us our dear little fourteen-year-old daughter, who was a member of Comfort's League of Cousins. Her number was 534. It was hard to part from our darling, but God's wisdom is greater than ours and He knows what is best for us all.

Your League is a blessing to the young folks, and if every member will try as hard to live up to the principles and rules as our darling did, there surely will soon be a great change for good in this old world.

Sadie Brown was born in Johnson Co., Texas, near Grand View and lived there until Jan. 1st, 1906, when she moved to Sterling Co. She was a precious, good child, and lived as near right as it is in human nature to live.

Her mother,

Mrs. R. F. Brown.

Our League is so large and contains so many members, that I thought it best not to notify you when Death calls any of the cousins from our ranks, as I should thus be compelled to chronicle such sad events monthly, and that would cast a gloom over too many homes. I thought though you ought to read Mrs. Brown's letter as it shows what a place this organization holds in the homes and hearts of our readers. To you, dear Mrs. Brown, let me say this: Think of your child, not as dead but as living; not as a flower that has withered, but as one that transplanted and touched by a Divine hand, is blooming in richer colors and sweeter shades than those of earth.

richer colors and sweeter snaues than those of earth.

She is not lost to you, who is found to Christ, she is not taken from you but merely gone before. Like a star she has vanished from your sight merely to shine brighter in another and far serener clime. God hold you patient and uncomplaining, and help you to bear the weight of your great sorrow.

Safely, safely gathered in Far from sorrow, far from sin, No more childish griefs or fears, No more sadness, no more tears, For the life so young and fair Now hath passed from earthly care, God himself the soul will keep, Giving His beloved sleep.

Dear Uncle Charlie and Cousins:

Here I come with a hop, skip and a jump right into your great big lap with the rest of the cousins.

Now I will tell you what I look like. I am about five feet in height, have acburn hair, blue eyes, weigh one hundred and eight pounds. I live on a farm of one hundred and thirty-three acres, but think I would like it better in the city, as this neighborhood is so dull and the neighbors are scarce. Our country here is mostly hilly and some of the land is very poor. The scenery is very beautiful all the vear around. The principal crops are corn, wheat and potatoes. I have three brothers and three sisters living. My papa is a large, fat man and my mamma is a small women. I like to work out in the field better than housework, but, Uncle, do not think by that I cannot do housework for I can. If you will come and make me a visit I will make you a "tansy" pie for a surprise. Well, Uncle, if the flies are as bad up in Maine as they are here be carfull they don't eat your bauld head up. For we cousins do not want a headless Uncle, so be carfuil. I send my love to Toby and Marie and to yourseif a big hug so don't get scared. Your loving niece.

2414 W. 4th St., DULUTH, MINN., May 24, *07. DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE AND COUSINS: I am fifteen years young, five feet, seven inches tall and have light brown hair and blue

I am fifteen years young, five reet, seven inches tail and have light brown hair and blue eyes.

I am working in a candy factory and get $3.50 a week. Have worked there nearly a year. I will tell you about the places I worked in. I first worked in a private family as assistant, but only got $8 a month. I worked there one month and a half, and then the lady wanted me to do everything for the same wages, but I wouldn't and quit, and lost $4 in that bargain.

My next place was as a scrub girl in a hotel, and I had to get up at two o'clock and work till seven, then sleep until ten, and work until twelve, and had all the rest of the day for myself. I got $3.75 a week there, but worked only two days and then quit.

When I first went into the scrub girls' soom, they were sitting on the bed playing cards and swearing. I learned to use quite a bit of slang while there, but have forgotten most of it now. I will tell you of the pets we used to have. They were Joe, and Susie and Jimmy. Joe and Susie were little turtles just as large as a quarter of a dollar, and Jimmy was a woodchuck we had captured and tamed.

Susie and Jimmy both ran away, but as for Joe—my brother put him in his coffee cup one morning and my father put hot coffee on it by mistake.

I would like to hear from the cousins and

WILLMETTA CLARK (10,097).

Good by for this time, your loving niece and cousin.

WILLMETTA CLARK (10,097).

Willmetta, your experiences as an expert with the scrubbing brush are quite thrilling. I commend you for the courageous way in which you, at the age of fifteen went out into the world to earn your living. I should like a large oil painting of the lady who paid you eight simoleons a month, and wanted you to do "everything for the same price" without raising the ante. It is wonderful how generous some people can be and still live. I bet she had heart failure every time she dug up the "eight." That was quite a lengthy stay you made at the hotel, but if you worked for two days and got $3.75 a week for forty-eight hours' work you did well. I am horrified to hear that the scrub ladies were playing cards and swearing. I hope they did not rope you into a poker game, and skin you of any of that $3.75. Scrub ladies have no right to swear. I'll admit that getting up at 2 g. m. (g. m. means good morning) and chasing a scrubbing brush over thirteen acres of flooring, freckled with the relies of tobacco and expectoration, is enough to make a girl swear in 74 languages. A girl may scrub and still be a lady, for a scrub girl does not need to be a scrub unless she swears, then she is fourteen times of a scrub.

I am sorry the turtle met such an untimely scrub.

I am sorry the turtle met such an untimely fate. Making turtle soup with hot coffee is a recipe that should be of use in the Sisters' Corner. As regards the woodchuck, I remember years ago, before I had permanently engaged a seat on the water wagon, that I went to an Irish christening, and somebody put three or four gallons of snake cure in my coffee, and I swallowed it and carried it home. I got it home with the help of three policemen. I was boarding with a prohibition family, and every night before I was permitted to go to my room the man of the house used to make me repeat this little formula as fast as greased lightning, and if I did not do it just right I had to sleep out in the back yard! This was it: "How much wood could a woodchuck chuck, if a woodchuck could chuck wood." That I am sorry the turtle met such an untimely sounds easy doesn't it? Well, try it and see. When I fell through the door after the christening, I was requested to repeat the woodchuck speech, and this is how I did it. Dear Uncle Chardie:

I received my League button and card all right, and I want to thank you for sending them. I sure am proud of them. Well, Uncle, you have had most all kinds of diseases. Did you ever have the chickenbox. They have all had it around here, but we haven't caught it yet, are we not lucky! Well I will describe myself, I am thirteen years old, "cight one hundred and five pounds, am light compacted, have light hair and light gray eyes, and am five feet seven inches tall. Well Uncle, I see you are getting tired, so I will hop off your lap, if someone will hand me my bonnet! I remain your niece, ably imagines, a couple of newsboys or bootblacks.

They were members of the great army of children and youth whom a hard Fate condemns to earn a precarious livelihood by selling papers, flowers, etc., on the crowded streets of our great cities.

What a schooling for a young girl!

The dialogue with which our story opens took place at the corner of Frankfort Street and Park Row, where the newsboys and newsgirls are wont to congregate at certain hours of the day.

The disputants were well-known characters

The disputants were well-known characters in that neighborhood.

One was named Madge Mason, the other Annie Kelly.

As it is with the former that our story has principally to deal, we will speak of her first principally to deal, we will speak of her first.

If our readers have decided because of her "tough" dialect that there was anything "tough" in her appearance, let us haste to correct the mistake.

Though she was clothed in rags, there was something in Madge Mason's appearance, the way in which she carried herself, the poise of her head, that distinguished her from the rest of the crowd by which she was surrounded. She was apparently in her fifteenth year. Her form, though slight, was well proportioned; her face was strikingly beautiful.

Imagine an oval outline, olive complexion, dark, flashing eyes, a small, exquisitely formed nose, red, pouting lips, and all crowned by a wealth of tangled black hair, and the picture of Madge Mason is before your mind's eye.

eye. As for her companion, she was simply a type of the wretched denizens of the neighborhood—coarse-featured, common in every movement, bearing the unmistakable stamp of the iron hand of Poverty.

The threat with which our story opens was strong by Madge.

Madge's cheeks were flushed with anger, and as Annie shouted the last contemptuous taunt she hissed: 'I'll show yer ef I kin make yer sorry or not!"

And she sprang upon the other girl like a little tigress.
But two of the boys rushed forward and pulled them apart.
"Quit dat now, Madge," said one of them, a good-natured looking, freckle-faced lad of about fifteen. "Fightin' ain't no business fer gals."

about fifteen. "Fightin' ain't no business fer gals."

"You let me go, Dave Lane," panted Madge, "or I'll scratch yer eyes out."

"Oh, no, I guess you won't," grinned the boy, who was holding her in a vise-like grip. "Now keep quiet, Madge, kinder cool down; I con't wanter see you hurt."

"See me hurt!" sneered the girl; "yer won't see me hurt, but yer'll see her pulverized!"

"Yer will fight, hey?"

won't see me hurt, but yer'll see her pulverized!"

"Yer kin bet I will."

"Yer kin bet I will."

"Den yer've got ter fight square."

"What d'yer mean?"

"I mean I won't have none o' dis hair-pullin' an scratchin'. Ef yer've got ter fight, why den we'll make a ring, an' yer kin settle dis here little dispute like ladies. How does dat strike yer?"

"It goes." replied Madge promptly.

"An what d'yer say, Annie?" inquired Dave of the ofher girl.

"It's all der same ter me as long as I git at her," was the reply, which was accompanied by a vindictive glance at Madge.

"Den form a ring an' let der fust round begin," directed Dave. "Jakey Sloman, you act as referee."

The ring was formed.

The ring was formed.
"Now den," said Jakey, "let 'er go."
Well, the two girls did "let 'er go."
But the fight did not last long.
In fact, it had scarcely begun when a tall, good-looking young man, plainly but respectably dressed, and evidently a mechanic, broke through the ring and laid his hand on Madge's shoulder.

shoulder.

"Well," he said fixing his steel-gray eyes steadily upon the girl's face, "I am surprised."

Madge's face turned from red to white.

All at once her warlike spirit seemed to depart, and she hung her head like a whipped should be a shou

The stranger paid no attention to the query, but said to Madge:
"Will you come with me?"
The girl looked wonderingly up into his kindly face.
"Go wid you?"
"Yes."

"Where?"

"Down to the place where I work; it isn't far from here. I'd like to have a little talk with you."

"Then will you come?"

Annie Kelly was evidently about to make some sneering remark, but at this moment one of the boys shouted:
"Cheese it! a cop!"
A burly policeman was approaching.

A burly policeman was approaching.
The crowd instantly scattered, Madge and the stranger going down Frankfort street.
"Now," began the young man, "I'll tell you why I wanted to speak with you alone."
But before he could go any further a hand pulled his sleeve, and looking around, he saw the newsboy. Dave Lane.

The lad's face wore an anxious expression.

"Kin I speak wid yer a minnit, mister?"

"Certainly," replied the young man. "What is it?"

"I wanter say dat Madge is white." "I wanter say dat Madge is white." "White?"

"I mean she's straight—straight as a string, an' der ain't one o' der fellows dat wouldn't tell yer de same."

The girl hesitated.
"You're not afraid of me, are you?" asked the young man.
"I ain't afraid o' no one dat wears shoe-

And Madge glanced ruefully at her patched, though neat, garments.

"I am not such a very fine gentleman," laughed Ralph, "that you need worry any. I'm only a plan working-man. But here we are at the bindery; just step in the hallway a minute and I'll say what I have to say in a very few words."

Madge followed him, and unceremoniously seated herself on an old packing-box that happened to be standing near the entrance.

"Go ahead," she said, almost brusquely.

"I will," smiled the young foreman. "I have thought for a long time that it was a pity for a girl like you to be selling papers on the street for a living."

"Plenty odder girls do it," said Madge.

"Yes, but not girls like you."

"Well," admitted Madge, "I ain't noways stuck-up; but here is some of 'em dat I don't care much about goin' wid, an' some dat I won't have nothin' to do wid."

"I don't doubt it. How old are you, Madge?"

Madge flushed.

"I've got ter make a livin'," she said.

"Yes, but wouldn't you rather make it in "What diff'rence does it make w'ether I would or not, Mr. Straight? I don't know enough ter go inter anyt'ing else."

"Would you really like to change your way of living?"

"Wud I? Of course I wud, sir." "Then I will help you."
"You, Mr. Straight?—how?"

"Well, boss, I ain't no Jay Gould, but if she's in any trouble I'll go bail fer her. I've got money salted down, an' it's hern ef she needs it, every blamed cent of it."

"No, indeed, I am not. I'm a foreman down at Stanley's book-bindery, and all I want is to have a little private talk with her."

"Den I begs yer pardon, boss. I feel kinder like a brudder ter Madge, 'cause I've watched her grow up sense she wa'n't higher'n my knee, an' maybe I was a little too fresh ter speak ter yer. Did yer ever see a flower grow up right in der middle o' weeds dat seemed to be a-tryin' dere level best ter choke it an' yet couldn't? Well, dat's Madge, an' I wouldn't see no trouble come ter her, not fer all I've got in dis world or ever expect to have."

There was a suspicious moisture in the young man's eyes, as he replied:

"I'll do it, boss. S'long."

CHAPTER II. THE BEGINNING OF A NEW LIFE.

When Dave had left them, Ralph Straight turned to Madge.

"Perhaps I could get you work in the bindery. Would you like that?"
"You bet I wud. But I don't know nothin' bout der bizness."
"You can be taught; some branches are very easy."

"You can be taught; some branches are very easy."

"Who'd take der trouble ter teach me?"

"I would, or my sister will show you."

"Yer sister, sir?"

"Yes, she works here, too. But I'll tell you what to do, Madge."

"What?" and the girl's eyes sparkled with pleasurable anticipation.

"Come to my house tonight and I will introduce you to my mother and sister and we will have a long talk about this matter."

The girl's eyes filled with tears.

"What makes yer so good ter me, Mr. Straight?" she asked. "I ain't used ter it, an' I dunno what ter make of it."

"Make this of it," said the young foreman, taking her hand: "that I like you and want to see you in a place more worthy of you. Shall I meet you and take you to my home after work tonight?"

"No, no," replied the girl hastily, "I ain't fit ter be seen wid yer. But I've got better clothes 'n dese, an' I'll put 'em on when I come. Besides, I won't be through wid my papers till long after you're home. Tell me where yer live an' I'll come somewheres round eight o'clock."

Ralph wrote his name and address on the back of a business card.

"You can read?" he questioned.

Ralph wrote his name and address on the back of a business card.

"You can read?" he questioned.

Madge's face flushed.

"Course I can. I ain't so blamed ignorant as all dat. And I can write pretty well, too."

"I didn't mean to offend you, Madge," coid the young man apologetically. "Well. "I didn't mean to offend you, Madge," said the young man apologetically. "Well, then, we'll look for you at eight o'clock. Good by."
"Good by, sir."

And the girl started and ran in the direction of the newspaper offices with a grace and freedom of motion that would have been impossible for a girl educated in a more refined but less natural school.

At eight o'clock that evening Ralph Straight, his gentle-faced, widowed mother, and his sister Alice were seated in the parlor of their little east-side flat, awaiting Madge's "You've sold me a paper every morning and

"You've sold me a paper every morning and every evening for two or three years."

"Yes, sir," returned the girl with downcast eyes, and a voice that was much gentler and more musical than that which she had used toward her late opponent in the fight.

"Yet this is the first time you have ever heard my name."

"Yes, dis is der fust time."

"I have heard yours before—that is, your first name, but I do not know your last."

"It's Mason."

"Madge Mason. Well, Madge, I suppose you wonder why I have asked you to walk with me."

"I was wonderin'. I ain't fit to be seen wid de likes o' you." "What a strange fellow you are, Ralph!" said Mrs. Straight, gazing half admiringly and half wonderingly into her son's face.
"You' are always doing something that no one else would ever think of doing. Now why do you want this street waif to come here?"

why do you want this street want here?"

"Oh," laughed Alice, teasingly, "it's because she's very pretty. I've often seen her. Ralph buys a paper from her every morning and another one every evening just for the sake of exchanging a word with her."

"I want her to come here," said Ralph gravely, ignoring his sister's remark, "because I believe that she is too good for the life she leads and I want to help her to a better one. I think that I can read in her face truthfulness and nobility, and I don't want to see those qualities trampeled in the mire of Cheery Street."

Cheery Street."

"I was only joking, Ralph," said his sister, putting her arms around his neck and kissing him. "But what a strange fellow you are! While other young men spend their time and money in barrooms and such places, you are always trying to do somebody good."

"He is just like his father," said Mrs. Straight, with moistened eyes. "Ah! I have reason to be proud of both my children!"

At this moment there came a timid knock upon the door.

"Come in!" said Mrs. Straight, and Madge entered.

one was now dressed in a plain but neat calico dress, and wore a simple black turban. Ralph thought that he had never seen her look so beautiful, and tried to imagine her in a really handsome costume.

in a really handsome costume.

She was evidently embarrassed, but the motherly Mrs. Straight put her at her ease in a very short time.

"Ralph has said a good deal to me about you," she said, "and I have felt really anxious to see you. He takes a great interest in you."

"He's awful good," said Madge, with a grateful look at the young man, "but I dunno's I'm worth so much trouble."

At this point Ralph with ready tact excused himself and left the room; thinking that Madge would be more at her ease and speak more freely if left entirely with those of her own sex.

Madge would be more at her ease and speak more freely if left entirely with those of her own sex.

"Have you any parents living?" asked Mrs. Straight kindly.

Madge shook her head.

"No, dey're both dead—died long ago, w'en I was a little kid."

"Do you remember them?"

"I don't remember me fader, but I do me mudder. I remember de day she died, dough I wasn't but six years old den."

And tears came to the girl's eyes.

But she choked them back and went on:

"She called me over ter where she was a-dying, an 'she says: 'Madge, I'm a-goin ter leave yer, an' yer won't never see me no more. But,' she says, 'I'll always be wid yer in spirit, an' ef ever ye're tempted ter be bad t'ink dat I'm a-lookin' at yer an' a-prayin' fer yer.' I never forgot dem words, Mis' Straight, an' I t'ink dey's kep' me good more dan anyt'ing else."

"I don't think you would be very bad anyway," said Alice, warmly.

"Maybe I shouldn't," said Madge, "fer it allers kinder seemed to me ter be mean ter do anyt'ing crooked. I've been pretty hard up sometimes, but I never could steal or anyt'ing like dat. Dere was allers somethin' in me dat kep' me back. It's easier ter go hungry dan it is ter eat dishonest bread—dat's my idea."

"And it's the right idea, too," said Alice, enthusiastically. "And now I must tell you right off that Ralph has got a place for you in the folding-room at the bindery. Will you take it?"

"Will I?" cried Madge, her eyes kindling.

"Will I?" cried Madge, her eyes kindling.

take it?"

"Will I?" cried Madge, her eyes kindling.

"Well, I guess yes."

"The pay isn't large—not as much as you make selling papers probably."

"I don't care fer dat, as long as it gits me off o' der street an I kin do der work. Do yer t'ink I kin learn easy?"

"Of course you can, there's nothing but what I can show you in a few minutes. I'm not in that department, you know, but Ralph is foreman—in fact he really runs the business—and he will let me stay with you until you know all that I can teach you. But there will be some things that you won't like; for instance, it is very confining work, and you are used to an outdoor life."

"Dat don't make no difference. I'll be glad ter get it."

"You won't like all the girls."

"I don't like any of 'em dat I'm wid now. Oh, don't yer worry 'bout me, Miss Alice; I've got sand, I have an' if I git dis chance I'll make der most of it."

"I believe you will," said Alice earnestly. "I forgot to ask you where you live."

"In Cherry Street in de same house where me mudder died," said Madge; "I board wid Mrs. Maguire. "Tain't much of a place—dere's six of us—Mrs. Maguire an' four chidren an' me sleeps in one room."

"We must get a better place for you," said Alice.

The conversation was continued for half

The conversation was continued for half an hour longer, and then Ralph came in and took Madge to her miserable home.

But, wretched as the place was, it is safe to say there was not a happier or more hopeful girl in New York that night than Madge

CHAPTER III.

SHIRLEY EVERTON'S SKELETON.

We must now shift the scene of our drama to one of the many almost palatial mansions that line Madison Avenue.

The home of old Shirley Everton, though not one of the most showy, was one of the finest in the vicinity of Madison Square.

Mr. Everton had amassed a fortune on Wall Street and retired from business at the age of sixty to enjoy his wealth and the companionship of his only son, whose name was the same as his own.

The tastes of Shirley Everton, Sr. and Shirley Everton, Jr. were widely different.

The father was simple, almost austere in all his habits; the son found no pleasure except when engaged in some escapade.

Old Snirley Everton's favorite companions were his books; young Shirley Everton's were the men about town whom he met at his club, and similar characters.

It was whispered that Mr. Everton had been a little "wild" when he was young and that he was therefore more lenient with his son.

It was also said that young Shirley's lack of brains caused his father more uneasiness than his numerous dissipations, and there seemed (CONTINUED ON PAGE 9.) We must now shift the scene of our drama to be of the many almost palatial mansions that to "The Pretty Girls' Club" you have to do just one thing and that is—vant to be pretty. Now I'm quite sure that takes in every girl in the United States—to say nothing of the rest of the world. And if you want to be pretty, then you can be a member of our Club, and if you are a member of our Club, then it becomes my duty to make you pretty. You think that's hard? Why, it's the easiest thing in the world, for we were all meant to be pleasant to look at, and if you aren't, it's just because your body has got into an unattractive condition and you don't know how to get it out. Do you know, half of you do not know how really pretty you are, what possibilities are hidden in the circle of your eyebrow, in the smooth softness of your hair, in your pretty features, in your daintily molded figure? You don't know because they are so hidden under a mass of absolutely unnecessary blemishes or short-comings. Your one good glorious point of beauty you have never even discovered, in fact, so lost it has become in a medley of small faults. Why not be pretty? Why not be attractive and charming? The women who can't be are few and far between, odd as this may seem. Well, I'm glad to do it, and I want you to feel that I'm a sort of confidential adviser to each of you. Every month I will talk on some special fault and the way to overcome it—on waists, for instance (who of us isn't interested in waists?), the thick waist and the thin waist, the long waist and the short waist; on the complexion, how to clear it, render it milky in tone, give a rosy flush to the cheeks; on the eyes; how to conquer the tendency to redness of the lids; on dimples; on the bust, how to develop and beautify it; on the hair, its proper tare, wrong habits of handling it and how to lose it; and in each monthly talk I shall give you harmless recipes for articles that can be used in the toilet with delightful results. But this is not all. No, this is the very least of what the editor has asked me to do. For, I'm to be just what I said, a confidential adviser.

To be a member of the Club means that you have the privilege of writing me confidentially, any and every time you want about anything that troubles you in your personal appearance, and I'll tell you my way to overcome it. So many people write me about just such things that I can't reply through the mails, but I'll answer in these columns. some good reason for these unpleasant rumors. Young Shirley Everton was not a fool by any means, but he was not the shrewd, farseeing man that his father was.

But when the old gentleman retired from business worth a couple of million dollars it was generally understood that he intended to take his son in hand and "make a man of him."

If this was his purpose it is to be regretted that he never carried it out.

Within a fortnight after the day when the affairs of the banking house of Everton and Young were settled the senior partner was suddenly stricken down.

After three days illness he died, leaving his son, Shirley, sole heir to his estate—his wife having died many years before.

The gossips again indulged in a little whispering—this time to the effect that young Shirley was not utterly inconsolable at his father's death, that he was, in fact, rather glad to be free from the reins which were already beginning to be drawn rather tightly.

But this must have been a slander, for he seemed utterly crushed with grief at his father's funeral, and wore at least six inches of crape on his hat for a long time after the melancholy event.

But be this as it may, there is no doubt that funeral, and wore at least six inches of crape on his hat for a long time after the melancholy event.

But be this as it may, there is no doubt that on the very evening when Madge Mason's visit to Ralph Straight's house occurred a well-dressed man stood in front of the Everton mansion gazing at a light in a second-story window. "You're up there, are you, my fine fellow?" he muttered with a smile that would have been as disagreeable to young Everton as his words if that youth could have seen and heard both. "You're up there, are you, getting ready for the big ball at the Academy? although your old dad hasn't been underground a year. Well, that's all right, it's none of my business, but if I am not badly mistaken you won't care to go to that ball tonight."

After this brief sollloquy he ascended the steps of the mansion and pulled the bell.

To the girl who came to the door he said: "Tell Mr. Everton that an old friend wants to see him and wants to see him right away."

The girl hesitated.

"I'm not sure that he's in, sir," she said.

"But I am," said the visitor, brushing past her and entering the reception-room. "He's upstairs fixing up for that ball at the Academy. The stranger's audacity was too much for the girl, and she vanished.

A few minutes later a smoothy-shaven man in evening dress entered the room where the stranger was stretched out on a blue silk divan and said:

"Your business. sir?"

"Are you Mr. Everton?" asked the visitor.

and said:

"Your business, sir?"

"Are you Mr. Everton?" asked the visitor.

"No. sir: Mr. Everton is engaged, sir."

"Who are you!"

"His valet, sir."

"Then gc back and tell him that my business is with the master, not the valet, and that it is business which must be attended to in quick time."

quick time."
The valet coughed nervously.
"What name shall I say, sir?"
"Oh, say any name you like, but tell him to come down here; or I'll go up where he is if he wishes."
The valet left the room.
"Big lugs, here," muttered the stranger.
"Maybe I shall come to this sort of thing if this enterprise succeeds. I understand young Everton has become an Anglomaniac lately, and this looks like it—a valid as if a big, overgrown booby like him wasn't file to dress himself."

His soliloquy was interrupted by the entrance of young Evertor himself. He was a wall-built young fellow of twenty-three or four, and would have looked a good aca, like a man, despite his weak cast of countenance, if it had not been for the affected air which he chose to assume.

"Well, sir," he began, "you have insisted upon seeing me and I am heah. I am Shirley Evertom and I am Richard Harold."

"Aw! Well, Mr. Harold, what can I do for you? It is abfter ten o'clock, doncher-know, and I have an engagement, and if your business is not important—"

"But it is important, as it happens," interrupted the visitor coolly, "and I have a notion that you won't feel like going to the ball tonight."

"Sir!"

"Don't get on your high horse. Are you sure that we cannot be overheard?"

"Ya-as.

"I'll take the liberty of closing that door behind you, however."

"B-ba Jawve!"

"Now, then, Mr. Everton, I'm going to take the liberty of asking you a few questions."

"B-ba Jawve!"

"Ya-as, doncherknow, but—"

"Wait a moment, I'm not done yet by any means. Your father left you about two million dollars, I think."

"B-ba Jawve! by what right—"

"Oh, you needn't answer that question if you don't want to; I know that he did. Now you don't happen to be master of any trade or profession, do you?"

The young Anglomaniac glared at his visitor in indignation.

"I, an Everton, a blawsted tradesman! What do you mean, fellah?"

The young Angiomaniae glared at his visitor in indignation.

"I, an Everton, a blawsted tradesman! What do you mean, fellah?"

"Well, I mean that it's just possible that you may have to go to work just as your father did before you, and that before many weeks."

"Be patient, keep your dress-coat on, and I'll explain. Did your late father leave a will?"
"No."

"Be patient, keep your dress-coat on, and I'll explain. Did your late father leave a will?"
"No."
"Yet you inherited all his property?"
"Yaas, being next of kin, and my mother being dead, doncherknow."
"But suppose I told you that you were not next of kin, that your late respected father led a double life, that he had another wife whom he married before he married your mother, and that you are no more the rightful heir to his property than I am."
Everton's affected air vanished.
He was no longer an Anglomaniac.
"What do you mean, you scoundrel?" he hissed. "Dare you insinuate—"In such a case," interrupted Harold, "I never insinuate. But I dare state facts, and I'll give you those I possess in a nutshell. You are not your father's legal heir, for the reason that your mother was not his legal wife. He had another wife, whom he married years before he met your mother. That wife left a child, a girl, who is the true heir to Shirley Everton's estate."
"The proofs of this infamous story!" hissed Everton, with pallid lips.
"Here they are—the wedding certificate, the proofs of the girl's birth, and a number of letters in your father's handwriting. Look them over at your leisure—I'll wait."
Everton eagerly perused the documents. When he had finished he turned to his visitor, asking: "Does this girl live?"
"She does, and right in this city."
For a few moments the young millionaire gazed fixedly into his companion's eyes.

CHAPTER IV.

A POSITION OF PERIL. There was a good deal of meaning in Shirley Everton's look, and Harold returned it with a gaze of equal significance.
The millionaire was the first to speak.
"Your proofs are indisputable," he said.

"Of course they are. What have you to say?"
"What do you intend to do about it?"
"That depends upon you."
"Upon me?"
"Just so. I am here to talk business."
Everton touched a well, and his valet appeared.

"I shall not go to the ball tonight, Tompkins," said the young man. "You may go to bed."
"Yes, sir."
And the young man bowed respectfully and left

And the young man bowed tesperative the room.

"I told you you wouldn't care to go," said Harold, with an evil smile. "Now, then, I suppose you are ready to talk business."

"I am."

"Well, what do you propose?"

"To buy those papers."

"You can't do that."

"Why not?"

A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

MY DEAR COMFORT BOYS:

NOTHER season is upon us; how fast time passes, only a short time ago I closed up shop for the Summer, but I have not been idle, on the contrary have devoted much time and large quantities of "gray matter" planning and working to produce a larger and better column for the coming winter. For every monthly installment I have worked up ideas that are practical, terse and of value to all.

I have tried, tested or made everything described; each month new ideas will be treated upon, suitable to the season. For example we start with a Lawn or Porch Seat, there will be many days yet when this will be useful and much enjoyed by the family.

Lawn or Porch Seat

Lawn or Porch Seat

There could scarcely be anything in the line of carpenter work, simpler than this pretty seat which I designed especially for Comport's younger boys. Two common flat boards go to make the sides, being out and marked as shown in drawing. The seat proper is also an ordinary board but instead of being nailed to cleats it is in this case inserted into slots made just large enough to receive it. In addition to this search made just large enough to receive it. In addition to this a few long finishing nails may be used. The back is easily managed with the aid of a saw and is fastened in place fastened in place with brass screws. When complete the bench should be given several coats of paint and then a coat of var-mish, and the con-venient seat is ready for use.

Care of Tools

Every metal tool before being put away should be carefully cleaned, dried, and wiped with a rag moistened with kerosene or lard. Saws should alway be hung from pegs, planes placed on dry shelves, and bits and chisels dropped into sockets, blades upward. Every boy should have a small box to hold what few tools are needed for an ordinary repair job. As soon as the job is over he should return them. soon as the job is over he should return them to their regular place in the manner described. With a reasonable amount of care a tool should give good service and last a lifetime.

Movable Backston

If you like baseball and particularly pitching you know how mad your chum is when he has to chase your wild ones down a hot and dusty road. Now a backstop is a handy thing and doubly so when it can be easily moved. You can see at a glance how this one meets the latter requirement and what a doubly it so income.

you want to change second base to home plate so the sun won't be in the fielders' eyes. As the cut shows, it is simply a strong frame made of scantling, braced at the bottom with slant boards, and set upon flat boards which have each two 3 inch holes. The backstop rests upon the flat boards and stakes are driven through the holes to keep it firm and solid. Common wire netting is used to cover the open parts of the frame. If several boys get together they can easily rig this up in an hour without a penny of expense.

Breaking Glass Bottle Evenly

Breaking Glass Bottle Evenly

A bottle or any glass vessel may be broken off evenly in the following manner. First carefully mark all around the bottle at the point you want severed. Then heat a stove poker to a bright red and draw it all along the mark you have made. As soon as possible afterwards drop cold water on the mark and with a loud click the glass will break all around. A tap of the hand will then cause it to fall off. Then with a file round off the sharp edges of the new surface.

Here's a tool chest and work bench combined. It should be made of heavy material and of ample dimensions say 5 ft. long, 2 ft. wide, and 2 and a half ft. high.

As shown by the ac-As shown by the ac-companying illustration the ends are nailed to the box part and then cleats are put under the box to make it still more firm. A compartment receptacle for nails and screws of different sizes may be placed on the inside. The top or lid is fastened with three strong hinges. Small blocks

<-4"-> with V-shaped slots are nailed on the top to hold while being planed. This work bench is recommended. _`: for a shed of limited of limited size and may be taken out in the shade when the weather is making work more comfortable.

Raft

I do not need to tell you the fun that may be enjoyed with this raft. One glance, I think, is all the information you need. Get two logs, the heavier the better and drag them to the water's edge. Saw them off to a length of about six feet, slightly taper the ends from the water line upwards, and nail on cross pieces to within six inches of each end. Make a simple rudder as shown in "a", stick the stem up through a hole in the rear cross board, nail on a two foot piece for a handle and we are off. The paddles may be made of any flat pieces, wide barrel staves of light material being about the best.

Chemical Experiment

Chemical Experiment

One way to create cold is to absorb heat out of the air and this is the object of all freezing mixtures. Common sal-ammoniac, well pulverized, one part; saltpeter, two parts; mix well together. Then take ordinary soda well pulverized. To use, take equal quantities of these preparations (they must be kept covered and separate until used) and add enough water to make a nice mixture. Put the article to be frozen in a tight vessel sealed tightly and then place it in the mixture described and cover up the freezing pot. No matter how hot the weather is in a short time your article will be frozen solid. frozen solid.

If you live in a town of any considerable size you can make plenty of pocket money selling pop corn. The way it is prepared is too simple to need any explanation. The selling is just as simple if you are of the right caliber. Be very careful to have your product of the highest quality and go to meet the trains, to the post-office and wherever and whenever crowds gather. The percentage of profit is very large and the work is light and pleasant.

Now, boys, if you will busy yourselves with the things I have suggested for this month, I will prepare some more for September.

Write me of your troubles and together we will straighten them out in quick order.

As ever,

Your Uncle John

Florence, your letter is not very lengthy, nor very interesting as a whole, and like most of the cousins you write with a lead pencil and from this I infer that pens and i. & have not penetrated into the wilds of Oklahoma. Never mind, Florence, your letter contains one piece of information that has got all the medical authorities in the U. S. woozy. Florence, you have discovered a new disease, and that is as great a distinction as discovering a new continent. The disease I refer to is the chickenbox." This is something new in the disease line, and I want you to tell us where your friends caught this chickenbox, and how long it took them to get over it. Was it a tin box, or a wooden box! Of course if it was a small box they could get over it in a minute, but if this particular chicken box happened to be of an extra large size, they might take several days to get over it. Possibly they would have to construct ladders, or inflate balloons or airships before they could get over it. I have had any number of diseases, such as hydrophobia, housemaid's knee, leprosy, spinal Mc. Guinness, appendicitis of the overalls, paralysis of the pocketbook, lockjaw of the collar button, influenza of the tooth brush, bunions on the teeth, inflammation of the suit case, and other slight ailments of that kind, the collar button, influenza of the tooth brush, bunions on the teeth, inflammation of the suit case, and other slight ailments of that kind, but never, no never, did I have the chicken box. I had an elephant's trunk once, but never a chicken's box. Medical men are greatly excited, Florence, over this matter, and I trust you will at once furnish all the additional information you can about the disease. I can't find your bonnet, it has got mislaid. probably you left it in the chicken box.

Comfort's League of Cousins

Comfort's League of Cousins

For the information of those who have not been regular readers of Comfort, and others who are becoming interested in the Cousins' League for the first time, and are ignorant of its aim and objects, the following facts will be of interest:

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of Comfort's immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of Comfort's family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Though the older folks are admitted, the young folks will always be the first consideration, and Uncle Charlie will write his page with a view of entertaining our young people solely.

Those who wish to join our League can do so by subscribing to Comfort for one year or inducing some one else to subscribe, and sending us their subscription. No premiums will be given those sending in members for the League.

If you are already a subscriber you can join by renewing your subscription, or subscribing a year ahead. You can have the membership card and button sent to yourself and the Comfort to a friend, if you already take the paper. All who join the League will receive a button and a handsome certificate of membership, also Comfort for one year, and the privilege of having their names in the letter list.

How to become a Member

How to become a Member

In order to become a full-fledged League member and procure a card and button, you must become a paid-in-advance Comport subscribtor by sending fifteen cents to the subscription department, for yourself, or renew your own subscriptions now. When you do this, send five cents extra, or twenty cents in all, and say that you wish to join Comport's League of Cousins.

The five cents additional pays your membership fee and for the League button and membership card engrossed with your own name and membership number. All previous League membership offers are hereby withdrawn and only those who strictly comply with our above offer will be admitted to membership. It costs but twenty cents to join the League, a League which promises to be the greatest society of young people on earth. Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could twenty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate, join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members, who desire a list of the cousins residing in their several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1442 Pacific St., Brooklyn, N. Y., our grand secretary. Some of the lists contain hundreds of names, so our secretary must have some triffing remuneration as she is devoting the whole of her time to this work.

The letter which appeared in the June lasue ever the signature of Gharile Enarch Aline. Texas, turns ever the have been of her time to this work.

The letter which appeared in the June lasue ever the signature of Charlie Ehardt, Aline, Texas, turns out to have been concocted by some one who evidently wanted to have fun at the expense of the original Bir. Ehardt. We regret deeply that this letter get into print, but we are antirely at the mercy (as are all other papers) of the practical joker, as it is utterly impossible to werify the authorship of the thousands of letters that reach us daily. All letters are accepted by us in good faith, but we cannot guarantee the genuineness of these communications, nor can we be responsible for their centants. This is the first time, however, since this department was started, that we have been imposed upon, and considering the tons of letters we have received, and the scores we have printed in the four and a half years this League has been in existence, we think this is a pretty good record. In conclusion let me say that those people who indulge in this contemptible and despicable form of joking may find it expensive fun, as forgery is a State's Prison offense and will land the offender, if caught, behind the bars for a good leng term of years—the longer the better.

League Sunshine and Mercy Work for August

By the plan given here you can make any perfume and should have no trouble in disposing of it for a good price. Take roses or any scented flowers and place them in a clean glazed vessel, sprinkling common salt on each layer of a half inch thickness. When the vessel is filled seal it tightly and place it in a cool dark place. In about five weeks strain the juice through gauze, bottle it, and expose it to the sun and dew to purify. This makes a very valuable and powerful perfume one drop of which will impart a strong seent to a pint of water.

Pop Corn

If you live in a town of any considerable size you can make plenty of pocket money selling pop corn. The way it is prepared is too simple to need any explanation. The selling is just as simple if you are of the right caliber. Be very careful to have your product of the highest quality and go to meet the trains, to the post-office and wherever and whenever crowds.

Our list this month is an unusually large one, and there is a very pressing call for wheel chairs. If all of you put a dime a month into this work, we could distribute one hundred and thirty-four chairs, $15.00 a chair, every four weeks. That is what we could do if all did their share, and played their part manfully and womanfully. There is no special shut-in's letter this month, so focus your attention on this list. All shut-ins appealing, must send references from a pastor and public official when possible. I do not get wheel chairs or raise funds for those who have parents and friends well able to take care of them. All shut-ins have a claim on our love and sympathy, but only the very poor can have our help. We must look after that large class of unfortunates who are friendless and penniless first. Those sick folks who have friends and relatives well able to take care of them, must make those friends do their duty, as we have all we can do in this League to look after the desperately needy and friendless is. Comfort Sisters' Corner

How many of you wanted a garden so bad this spring that you got down on your knees to dig it up? I did, and that with the strangest tool ever seen in a garden, namely the top spring of a buggy, with a handle fixed on one end. I can't use a hoe (being paralyzed since childhood and walk with crutches), so I invented the tool described and do all my digging with it, in spite of its blistering my hand. Fellow shut-ins, try my plan and get a garden in the same way and you'll be surprised to find yourself enjoying it, as well as freedom from headaches, blues and all the other horrors we particular poor creatures are worried with. And then the indescribable pleasure of watching your vegetation grow! I go out lots of times and look at Nasturtlums, Sweet Peas, Scarlet Runners, etc., etc., as well as all my kitchen vegetables and it does me good, for it was all earned by sheer hard work, doubly hard considering I'm lame. That's better than sitting indoors wondering why you weren't blessed with the physical abilities denied to you.

H. Stanley Bent, a partial shut-in, would be pleased to receive scraps of anything. Perforated cardboard, canvas with silk or wool to work with, beads or flower slips, or anything to occupy idle moments.

Continued success to the Sisters' Corner.

H. STANLEY BENT, Turbine, Tenn.

DEAR READERS:

I may be wrong but I firmly believe where a husband and wife are childless it is their duty to act as father and mother to some orphan children. Insensibly, childless couples grow very selfish. They do not realize it, and would deny the charge, but nevertheless they do. Nothing expands the heart of men and women like the love of a little child. Contributions to homes for orphans is well, but better take them to your own home and give them the love and sympathy the little hearts crave. You may think you cannot love other people's children but if you try it you will be convinced you can. I knew a gentleman once who adopted an orphan boy from a home and when the boy was grown his adopted father told me, "I would not take a million dollars in gold for him," and yet the adopted father in question, had children of his own. DEAR READERS:

not take a million dollars in gold for him," and yet the adopted father in question, had children of his own.

I never read a notice of a mother's death, but I send a prayer to my Father asking Him to raise up someone to love and care for the children left behind. You may say you are not fitted to raise children. Neither am I, but God sent me eight children, though afterwards he called back two. You may say, the children you adopt may turn out badly. They may, but that does not lessen your duty. I have known Christian parents whose children turned out badly, and I have known children of sin who became fine men and women. We can never tell. If possible, take more than one child. One will warm your hearts, but there is danger of that one growing up narrow and selfish, the very sins you wish to avoid. I knew a mother who had only one child. To keep him from being selfish she taught him to give a portion of every dainty that he received to her. Selfishness is a sin, and young people are more than apt to be selfish, and not realize it at all. Bachelors' wives and maiden's children are always well-bred" and childless people have no patience with their neighbors' noisy little folks, but when they love little ones belonging to them, the faults of other children do not appear so great.

but when they love little ones belonging to them, the faults of other children do not appear so great.

I knew two rich girls who could not adopt children. They each selected a little girl in a home to clothe and they made and carried clothing to the two when needed. I do not approve of this plan as the other children felt neglected, but if a few well-to-do girls would band together and make clothes and other things for little children in homes, and some not in homes for orphans, they would find a keener pleasure in life. They could meet together and sew and take home the unfinished pieces to sew on as they felt inclined.

How many of you, who own carriages, stop and gather up the little ones who gaze at you as you pass, wishing themselves in your place? And many a tired woman would thank you for a turn in some country road or in the parks. Anywhere to get out of the rut. If you sit and think awhlie, you whom God has entrusted with wealth, you can find many ways to do good and make others happy. You who can read well, can find those who cannot read at all, and life would feel worth living. There is nothing that can make you love God so well as making other people happy, doing good to those who cannot repay, and following the Bible verse, "Give to those that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow turn not thou away." In His Name. Lactre K. Haygood, 701 N. Wayne St., Milledgeville, Ga.

The Care of Young Stock

LEANLINESS must be the watch-LEANLINESS must be the watch-word just now, for chickens that are left to sleep night after night in a filthy coop cannot possibly grow. They are poisoned by the effuvia of the droppings, which poison enters the blood through the lungs, and the whole system is lowered in tone, and debilitated by it.

It is a simple matter to keep coops clean It is a simple matter to keep coops clean if they do not have wooden floors; and the floorless coop is much preferable, where the land is reasonably dry. Such a coop is easily cleaned by moving it forward, or backward, or endwise, to new ground; and if this is done three times a week when the chickens are small, and covery described the chickens are small.

and every day when the chickens are small, and every day when the chickens are small grown, there will be no difficulty with filthy coops. If the coops have floors, they (the floors) should be scraped clean and well sanded three times a week.

Take care, too, to thin out the chicks as they increase in size. A coop for a family of three or four weeks' old chicks will be too small for them when they are six or eight weeks old, and are twice the size.

Another most important point is the food ration. A very common mistake is to think that chicks can find a good deal of their food themselves. They do find some in the shape of worms, insects, etc., and they eat a good deal of grass; but regular feeds of sound, sweet grain are what they should have to induce steady growth. When our chickens are five or six weeks old, we relax in feeding in two ways. We feed but four times a day, instead of five, and the first feeding in ... e morning is of mixed meals, stirred up into a mash mixed with milk or water.

This mixed meal consists of one part each, corn meal, fine middlings, bran or shorts, ground oats, and meat meal. This is equal parts by measure. A scoopful of each is dipped out of the bag, and put into the receptacle in which it is to be mixed. Some people prefer a greater proportion of bran, and advocate two scoops of it to each of the others. We use judgment as to the amount of the bran, limiting it by the whole amount which we feed, and the conditions of the bowels of the chicks. If the bowels are inclined to be loose, we increase the quantity of middlings, and uccrease the quantity of bran. If the bowels are somewhat constipated (the droppings too firm and hard), we increase the quantity of bran. If the bowels are round to the reached too early. If it is reached too early, it is premature, and then sturdiness of frame is lacking. We should aim to feed a balanced ration, to the end that growth be continuous, and not too rapid. To this end animal food is essential, but it should be balanced by sure provided in the s which means we give the pullets every opportunity to grow.

The cockerels which we wish to save for breeding-stock are enclosed in large yards, of a quarter of an acre or thereabouts, near the farm buildings. The cull cockerels intended for market are shut up in fattening pens, and sent to market as soon as they are of marketable size, which with us is four or five pounds, live weight. We believe in sending the birds to market as soon as possible. We do not want to keep them a single day after that.

do not want to keep them a single day after that.

We want the pullets to reach laying maturity at about six months old, and not only to reach laying maturity at that age, but to be fully grown, strong, healthy and vigorous. Not every chicken hatched can be grown to this condition under the most favorable circumstances, but it is our aim, and it should be the aim of everyone who raises chickens, to get the best possible growth in the young stock, because that is the foundation of profit. We have stated over and over again in these We have stated over and over again in these columns that the best profit, the "creamy" profit, was gotten from early-hatched chickens kept growing so they should reach laying maturity before the cold weather, and then kept

There is an old proverb "Well begun is half done," and it is particularly true as regards chickens when hatched, and that come out "with a kick." They are well begun, and that is half the battle: but we should keen it in mind that it is only half, and that there is that other half to be stoutly worked for. We give the best possible chance to the pullets, which we want to be early layers, and keep them steadily growing to that end, which should be attained long before cold weather comes upon them; and this we find we can best attain by good care for cleanliness, etc., and feeding a liberal ration of sound, sweet grain.

It is easy to see that it is of the utmost importance for the chickens to be kept grow-

H. C. G.—I have lost two roosters and one hen with some disease that I fear is contagious. They had trouble to eat, and when I examined them, there was a growth on the tongue and mouth. Can you tell me what it was, and how to treat others, if any catch it? I am going to clean the chicken house and disinfect.

A.—The symptoms you describe suggest canker, which usually originates from cold, or bad sanitary conditions. Segregate the affected birds, and treat as follows: Dissolve half a teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in one pint of water. Dilute one tablespoonful of the mixture in half a pint of water, and swab out the bird's throat and mouth twice a day, allow half an hour to elapse after each application, and then apply equal parts of pulverized camphor, boracic acid, and subnitriate of bismicu, well mixed. Blow into nostrils and throat through a glass tube or straw.

min, well mixed. Blow into nostrils and throat through a glass tube or straw.

H. L.—What are the best things to grow for winter green food for chickens—things that I can plant now?

A.—Cabbages and beets can both be profitably used, although it hardly pays to feed good sound heads of cabbage to poultry, as it can usually be sold at a price which makes it unprofitable. Beets or mangel wurzels make an excellent food, either chopped up and placed in the morning mash raw or cooked, or split open to allow the hens to pick them to pieces.

There are a number of other forage crops that are available for winter and early spring feeding, first among which I should place winter vetch (vicia villosa), which will produce a good crop on any kind of soil, and is ready to cut earlier than any other forage plant. In fact, the whole crop can be taken off in time to prepare the land for corn. It is greatly relished by poultry, either cut up in mash or fed alone. It can be sown in the spring with oats or barley, or in August or September with rye, one bushel to the acre.

Essex rape furnishes another excellent green food for poultry, being best adapted for fall and winter feeding. If practicable it should be grown where the fowls can be turned upon it—in a portion of the run. In New England the best time to sow it is about the first of August, when it will be ready to feed in ten weeks, keeping green all winter. It should be sown at the rate of about six pounds to the acre, broadcast.

J. J. B.—A small advertisement will almost surely bring customers for your chicks. Go into the nearest town, and ask what the butcher will give.

C. W.—Had you explained the condition, I would gladly have helped you. A note addressed to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, asking for the Farmers' Bulletin, No. 197, which is devoted to squab raising, will bring you one of the best treatises on the subject I have read.

A.—You will probably find a dealer's address in the advertising columns. If not, get a Sunday paper from the nearest large city, and look up a dealer in fancy birds. He is pretty sure to be able to sell you what you want. For food, keep common Belgian hares in outside inclosures.

A.—I should think from the description that your hens are run down by lice. Clean out the coops thoroughly, then apply a coat of thick whitewash to every pail of which has been added an ounce of crude carbolic acid. Get a good insect powder and dust each bird, holding by the feet, head down, and rubbing it well into the fuffy feathers, thighs and tail. Your feed is all right, if the scraps are free from fat. Can old turkeys sleep outside in winter?

A.—Treat Pea fowl as you do turkeys. No, young turkeys are better in till the grass is dry, no matter what time it is. Yes, you must add some animal food, chopped liver, or meat. In such a severe climate as yours, they should be housed at night. Your letter was too late to be answered in the June issue.

E. K.—How can a crow be tamed if taken from the nest when young? How can you cut his tongue to make him talk? How should he be fed while young?

A.—If taken from the nest before being fully feathered, feed him raw meat, boiled oatmeal, pot cheese, boiled potatoes. At that age he won't need any special training. Don't know anything about tongue cutting. We had two, and their quaint tricks were quite entertaining enough, without teaching them to talk our language.

I have never seen a letter from this section of California.

We have a farm in the eastern part of Madera County, near the Sierra Nevada mountains. In fact, our pasture runs back into the low foothills of that range, but our house and farming land are out in the valley. There are nineteen hundred and sixty acres in our farm or "ranch" we Californians would say.

This portion of the county is devoted entirely to dry tarming and stockraising. By "dry farming" I mean that we have no artificial means of irrigation, as they have farther down in the valley, but depend entirely upon the rainfall to raise our crops. Naturally, then, we raise such crops as will be matured by the winter rains—wheat and barley being the principal grains. In California we seldom have a summer rain, and when it does rain in the summer we regard it as a great disaster.

There have been a few times when Mother Nature has apparently made a mistake of that kind and it has wrought havoc.

The farmers then have tons of grain still in the field waiting to be hauled to market; the feed in our pastures is dry by that time, and though it is equal to cured hay while it is dry, is rendered perfectly worthless when the rain falls on it.

Our winter has been exceptionally warm, with few frosts and heavy rains. We never have any snow in the valley, but I have only to lift my eyes when I can see miles and miles of snow, on the high mountains, then bringing my gaze back again I see green fields, dotted with wild flowers, which are now blooming in all their beauty, the gorgeous Eschscholtzia or California poppy, the dainty baby blue-eyes—just the color of the summer sky, the white popcorn flower, the purple cluster lily, buttercups, pansies, and so many others that it would take too long to enumerate.

Haying will soon begin, then by the time the hay is taken care of it will be nearly time for harvest. Should there be any spare time between haying and harvest the farmer will do some summer fallowing, that is he will plow the land now, let it lay all summer, then in the fall sow it in grain for next year's crop.

There is so much more I would like to tell you about California, but I must not wear my welcome out at my first visit.

I am deeply interested in the Sisters' Corner. especially the work for the shut-ins. I have written to many of them, and it has given me great pleasure.

I am going to ask the sisters to a letter party on Aug. 11, and I will answer all. On that day it will have been twenty-one years since my husband and I began our journey together. It has not always been easy traveling. Sometimes the road has been rough, and the skies have not always been cloudless, but the way has led through pleasant valleys, and the clouds have always had a silver lining, and we are thankful that we have been allowed to spend so much of our lives together. You may wonder why my address is Pollasky, Fresno Co., when I live in Madera County, so I will just explain that our nearest post-office is in Fresno Co.

MRS. M. STEVENS, Pollasky, Fresno Co., Cal.

MY DEARS:

What do you all think of our title page this month? Of course at this writing I have not the slightest idea what it will be, but feel assured that it will be appropriate and to the point. At any rate I am going to give three cheers for Comfort, the publishers, editors and all the sisters. I for one, Mr. Editor, wish to thank you heartily, vigorously, and vociferously. It really did not seem to me that Comfort could be improved, but you certainly are doing so all the time, "looking for friends, not profits!" I think the millinery department (which is such a help to those that cannot visit the stores and keep up with the fashions), the poultry talk, and information, our Recitation club, and hosts of other useful, interesting hints, and suggestions, worth fifteen cents a year. I know a woman who made and trimmed a hat from the ideas of Comfort's milliner, that is worth five dollars; it did not cost her one cent. Certainly we are getting everything which is of value to women.

If you will write me I can give rou the address of one of my girls who will help you out on the patterns you wished for.

Mrs. Mary McKee. A simple remedy for catarrh is to snuff water up the nostrils three or four times a day, sometimes milk is used instead of water.

Mrs. Miller. The collar you sent in is a beauty. The work is too fine for my optics. It surely is a veritable cobweb; how can you do it? Mrs. Williamson. Did you know that you could use crotchet patterns for cross-stitch designs and vice versa?

A. E. L. I thank you for the zinnia seed, I shall have sufficient (if they keep on coming as they have recently), to plant an acre, like "Cousin Harry" I cry "nuff, nuff!" How do I like Comfort? Why I love it and all connected with it, do not you? I know you do by the way you write. I confide some of my dearest and very best ideas, and thoughts to Comfort and they are reaching to the very ends of the earth.

I am pleased, at all times, to hear from any of you, but I must ask for the stamped directed envelope, or I cannot reply.

MAREL AND HER FATHER.

R. PARKHURST was not a man of strong mind or strong feelings. When he was angry or disturbed, instead of blazing out in a sudden fit of passion he indulged himself and annoyed others by a fit of sullen gloom, or peevish irritability, during the continuance of which it was quite impossible for anyone to please him.

It was in this way that he revenged himself for his daughter's firm determination not to sacrifice herself to Clarke for the sake of restoring her father to the position he coveted. Without directly reproving her for this resolve, he showed by his manner that he was disappointed and offended with her for her refusal. For example, at the breakfast-table one morning, Mabel asked her father if she should not pass him the plate of biscuit.

He responded with a deep sigh, "No, I have no appetite."

"Are you unwell?"

"I shall be soon if the mind has any effect when the body." MAREL AND HER FATHER.

"Are you unwell?"

"I shall be soon if the mind has any effect upon the body," said Mr. Parkhurst gloomly.

Mabel was silent, well knowing to what her father referred.

father referred.
"I feel that this life is wearing upon me," he continued in a melancholy tone. "My temperament and my tastes unfit me for living in the wilderness. There is not a moment when the city and the old life I led there are out of my mind."

mind."
"Don't you think you would enjoy yourself petter if you went about more?" asked Mahel.
"There are some very pleasant families about here."

By Horatio Alger, Jr.

"I have no spirits to go out," said the parent, "I should only carry gloom wherever I went."
"You think so now, father, but I think you would find your spirits imperceptibly rising."
"You know nothing about it, child. It may do for you who are young and can adapt yourself to new scenes, but for me it is impossible. I am like an old tree which has been violently torn up by the roots and removed to an incongenial soil. As it will inevitably die, so I look forward to but a short time spent in wretchedness, after which death will come as a happy release."
"Do not give yourself up to such gloomy fancies, father," said Mabel in deep distress.
"You make me unhappy."
"I am sorry to blight your happiness, but it will be only for a short time. I shall pass away, and in the happiness of married life you will forget me."
"Oh, father, how can you talk so?" remon-

"I am sorry to blight your happiness, but it will be only for a short time. I shall pass away, and in the happiness of married life you will forget me."

"Oh, father, how can you talk so?" remonstrated Mabel in deep concern.

"I do not speak thus to reproach you," said Mr. Parkhurst in the tone of a martyr. It may be remarked that although he had declined to receive a biscuit when proffered by his daughter, he had helped himself, and in spite of his despondence was eating with apparent relish.

"I do not say this to reproach you," he proceeded. "I suppose it is only natural that the young should be wholly wrapped up in themselves and in their own plans, and so forget those who have passed before them on the stage of life. You are only like the rest. And perhaps it is as well. I have no desire to act as a kill-joy to your happiness, and though I am wretched myself. I have no disposition to interfere with your enjoyment of life."

"But how can I enjoy life when I see you so unhappy, father? Is there nothing I can do to restore you to cheerfulness?"

"There is but one thing," said her father, "and that is a thing which I shall not ask of you. If any sacrifice is to be made, it is best that I should make it. You have more years to live than I, and it is best that I should go to to the grave rather than interfere with any of your plans."

This was setting the conduct of Mabel in an odious light, and under the cover of resignation really taxing her with selfishness and disregard of her father's happiness, while at the same time it undervalued the sacrifice which was demanded of her.

"Interfering with any of expressing a marriage cortainly a mild way of expressing a marriage."

of her.

"Interfering with any of your plans," was certainly a mild way of expressing a marriage with one whom not only she did not love, but for whom she felt a positive repugnance.

"You mean that I can help you only by marrying Mr. Clarke," said Mabel with a troubled expression.

whom she felt a positive repugnance.

"You mean that I can help you only by marrying Mr. Clarke," said Mabel with a troubled expression.

"That is the only way which will restore me to my former place in society, and so prolong my life!" said Mr. Parkhurst. "But I am not so selish as to require it at your hands. You would prefer to marry Henry Davenport, and I do not wish to influence your choice. To one at my age, a few years more or less of life make little difference, and I freely confess that if, as it appears likely, my life is to be spent in this wilderness, I would prefer to die. Life can have no charms for me. It will at least be a consolation to me"—this was said in his gloomlest manner—"to feel that my daughter has nothing to interfere with her happiness."

As Mr. Parkhurst said this, he supplied himself with his fourth biscuit, which he ate in a resigned way as if he ate only because he felt that it was necessary to life.

All this was very trying to Mabel, who felt that all her father said was meant as a reproach to her—particularly his references to her happiness.

"Father," she said, "I feel very much troubled by your unhappiness, and am sorry that I cannot do the only thing which would relieve you, but I cannot account for."

"It is enough," said her father in a melancholy tone. "As I said I do not wish to interfere with your plans, and if you prefer Henry Davenport—"

"Perfer!" repeated Mabel. "That is not the word. It would imply that this man Clarke was any way tolerable."

"He is a lawyer in good standing," said her father severely. "Because you do not choose to marry him, you should not malign him."

Mabel was somewhat taken aback by this unexpected defense of the lawyer from her father's lips.

Mabel was somewhat taken aback by this unexpected defense of the lawyer from her father's lips.

"At least you must admit his rascality in taking such an advantage of you as he is attempting to do."

"I am not clear about that," said Mr. Parkhurst perversely. "All men are selfish—some more than others perhaps—but none are free from it. This man finds himself in possession of a secret which gives him the power of obtaining something he is anxious to obtain. I do not know that we ought to blame him for availing himself of this for his own advantage."

"But father, is it not dishonest to withhold that which belongs to another?" asked Mabel in considerable astonishment. "Would a man of honor adopt such a method of forcing a compliance with his desires?"

"As to honesty, Mabel, you will remember that he might have taken the money and said nothing about it to any of us. It is clear to me that, whatever else may be said of him, he is not a mercenary man. No, he is evidently very much in love with you, and his love has led him to take advantage of this accidental discovery of the letter. No, I cannot permit you to speak of him unjustly, although it might be expected that I should be most disposed to reproach him. But though he has wronged me, I will yet be just to him."

"You are altogether too indulgent in your opinion of him," said Mabel.

"When you have lived to my age," said her father, "you will learn to look upon the world with different eyes. There is not so much different eyes. There is not

CHAPTER XXV.

A CONSULTATION.

The joyful expression upon the face of Henry Davenport confirmed Mabel's anticipations.

Dismousting from his steed he hastened to her side, saying, "Well, Mabel, what do you think I have got?"

"Yes, and I am to pay five hundred dollars for it."

"What can you mean, Henry?" asked the bewildered girl. "Surely the lawyer would not part with it for that sum?"

"No, and probably he knows nothing of its disposal. The purchase was made of Jerry."

"Yes, I see you are surprised, and I will no longer keep you in suspense. You must know, then, that as I was riding in the forest, I came upon Jerry apparently indulging in a fit of meditation. Accosting him, I inquired what occupied his thoughts, when he gradually led me on until he drew out our whole history, and ended by eliciting from me an offer of five hundred dollars for the missing letter, on which he at once produced the document and claimed the money. I feel so grateful to him for his thus removing the only impediment to our union that I shall faithfully keep my promise to him, and pay him the amount.

"I am more surprised than you. How did Jerry stumble upon such a valuable discovery?"

"He did not appear able to give much information upon that point. He had been hurrying along in the forest, and accidently came upon a pocketbook containing papers, and among them this."

"Belonging of course to Mr. Clarke?"

"Yes, his name was upon it."

pocketbook containing papers, and among them this."

"Belonging of course to Mr. Clarke?"

"Yes, his name was upon it."

"Could he have dropped it?"

"Hardly, for it seemed to be empty, so far as money is concerned. The probability is that it was stolen from him, and the pocketbook and paper thrown away after the money had been taken. But there is Mehitable coming to the house in a high state of excitement apparently. What can have happened?"

Mehitable, it will be remembered, was just from the woods where she had accomplished the deliverance of the lawyer. It was altogether too remarkable an adventure for her to keep to herself, and she accordingly rushed into the presence of her young mistress in a fever of excitement, intent upon telling all that had befallen her.

"What is the matter, Mehitable?" asked Mabel in some curiosity. "I judge from your manner that something remarkable has occurred."

"So there has, Miss Mabel. Something so supprising, and just to think that I should curred."

"So there has, Miss Mabel. Something so surprising, and just to think that I should have been the means of delivering him from his bonds."

have been the means of delivering him from his bonds."

"Him? Whom do you mean by him?" asked Henry Davenport with sudden interest, suspecting the truth.

"Why, Mr. Clarke to be sure: the gentleman that is boarding to the tavers. Oh, he has such sweet pretty manners!"

"You seem to be quite in love with him, Mehitable."

"Me!" simpered Mehitable. "How can you talk so, Miss Mabel! And to be sure, if I did, it would not be surprising, for he was so attentive. You can't think how polite and attentive he was. But I don't know whether it would be best to change my situation in life. Men are so deceitful!

"Mehitable, I protest against this wholesale aspersion upon the sex," said Henry Davenport with mock indignation and seeming great seriousness. "Fle upon you!"

"Perhaps I am wrong," said Mehitable, "but you know we girls have to be very circumspicious, don't we, Miss Mabel?

"Certainly," responded Mabel, keeping her countenance with difficulty. "But you have not told us about Mr. Clarke. Did you say he was tied?"

"Yes, he was tied hand and foot, and was laid under a tree. You can't think how my heart bled countenance with difficulty. "But you have not told us about Mr. Clarke. Did you say he was tied?"

"Yes, he was tied hand and foot, and was laid under a tree. You can't think how my heart bled for him, Miss Mabel. I was walking along as innocent as could be, when all at once I heard a voice. I was flustrated and going to run, till I knew who it was. He asked me to untie the cords for him, and you can't think how happy it made me feel to think it was I that came along just as I did. It would have been so dreadful if he had been obliged to stay there all night, and he might have caught cold, too."

Mabel and Henry Davenport exchanged a smile as they saw how deeply Mehitable had become interested in the lawyer.

"I suppose," said the young man jocosely, "that he repaid you with a kiss when you had succeeded in freeing him from his uncomfortable position."

Poor Mehitable! Her pride led her to think of using an evasion which might lead her auditors to imagine that she was admired by the object of her own admiration.

"If he did, I couldn't help it," she said modestly.

Young Davenport at first looked surprised, and then, as he fathomed the spinster's motive, amused, but out of consideration for her feelings he did not display any incredulity, though the lean, sallow, and wrinkled face of Mehitable certainly would warrant a doubt of her powers of fascination.

"How came Mr. Clarke in such a situation?" asked Mabel.

"It was all along of that wretch, Indian John," said Mehitable. She added with energy, "If I could get hold of him, I would scratch him."

"But what object could he have in binding Mr. Clarke? Did he have any grudge against Mr. Clarke? Did he have any grudge against him?"

"But what object could he have in binding Mr. Clarke? Did he have any grudge against him?"

"It warn't that. It was because he was a thief. He wanted Mr. Clarke's money."

Here Mabel and Henry Davenport exchanged a look of intelligence. By questioning they obtained from Mehitable all the additional information of which she was possessed. This, however, proved to be but slight.

A consultation was then held as to what was best to be done.

Of course it occurred to them that the lawyer, finding his pocketbook gone, with its valuable papers missing, would feel uneasy, and might be tempted to return to New York immediately, and possess himself of the treasure before anyone else could make use of the information to be obtained from the paper.

This was by all means to be avoided. It would, therefore, be advisable to ease his mind by holding out some inducements of a disposition to yield to his solicitations and agree to a marriage, accompanied by the desire of more time for consideration.

It was decided not to communicate the discovery to Mr. Parkhurst, lest by his changed manner he should awake the lawyer's suspicions. Furthermore it was arranged that Henry Davenport should at once proceed to New York, and as quietly as possible remove the treasure to some other place, after which he would return and the marriage would take place.

This would probably occupy a fortnight, as in that day the means of communications between different parts of the country were in their infancy compared with the present day, and the distance of three hundred miles between them and New York could not well be traversed in much less than a week, well be traversed in much less than a week of many accounts decided to be the best that could be fixed upon, and Henry Davenport agreed to start for the city inside of two days. Meanwhile Mabel was to keep the lawyer in tow until it should no longer be necessary to fear him, and enjoin Jerry to say nothing whatever of what had occurred. On the very next day Dick Clarke rode over to the Parkhursts' place. Although he was well satisfied that the papers had been destroyed by the Indian, the bare possibility that the most valuable one might have been preserved made him feel somewhat uneasy, and he therefore wished to know how his prospects stood with Mabel.

wished to know how his prospects stood with Mabel.

To his gratified surprise she received him more gently than he had hoped. She told him frankly, that her affections were set upon another, and that it would be painful for her to part from him; yet that in a matter where her father's happiness seemed so much involved she was not willing to decide hastily. She therefore begged him to allow her a fortnight to make up her mind.

Nothing in her manner excited the lawyer's suspicions, and he left the house with a happy conidence that the campaign would close in fourteen days with the happiest results to him.

CHAPTER XXVI.

JERRY RECEIVES A LETTER.

In those days the post-office service was very primitive. Letters came to the neighborhood about once a month and were usually left at Hill's Tavern to be called for. The receiver had to pay to get his letter, and often the charge was one or two shillings.

On the morning following the consultation between Mabel and Henry Davenport, Jerry was sent to the tavern to see if any letters had arrived.

"Mind you bring me a nice one," said Mehitable to the boy.

"If it's a dollar shall I pay for it, Hitty?"

"Mercy on me." No, indeed, Jerry Blue. A letter ought not to be over a shilling."

"But supposing it contains an offer of marriage? Some men, you know, would rather write a proposal than make one face to face."

"What do you know about proposals?" demanded the spinster.

"Oh, I know some men are as bashful as some ladies. Now I think Mr. Clarke is a real bashful man."

Jerry said this sarcastically, but Mehitable took it in dead earnest.

"Do you really?" she simpered.

"Why, to be sure. He's the most bashful man I ever set eyes on."

"Isn't it strange, I thought so myself, Jerry."

The spinster was thinking of the scene in the woods and what Henry Davenport had said about being kissed. "Well—ahem—you bring my letter, if there is one."

"And pay the dollar?" demanded Jerry teasingly.

"It won't be a dollar. It hadn't ought to be more than a shilling."

"But if it is half a dollar, or two shillings?" insisted the mischievous boy.

"Well, you can pay half a dollar, but it's an awful price," was the slow answer, and then Jerry started off, for the squire had told him to come back promptly.

As Jerry was on the way to Hill's Tavern he came up to Ivick Clarke, who was out on another hunt for the missing document of importance.

"Hullo, boy!" sang out the lawyer, in a by no means pleasant tone of voice.

As Jerry was on the way to Hill's Tavern he came up to Ilick Clarke, who was out on another hunt for the missing document of importance.

"Hullo, boy!" sang out the lawyer, in a by no means pleasant tone of voice.

"Hullo yourself!" returned Jerry. He did not feel like being polite to one who had caused trouble for his master and his young mistress. Ilick Clarke looked at the boy sharply.

"You're a very nice boy," he remarked celdly.

"Thank you," answered Jerry.

"Ohn't they teach you any manners at the Parkhursts!"

"All the manners I want."

"My, but you are impudent!" cried Dick Clarke. "It seems to me you ought to have a dressing down."

"If I do need dressing down, you'll not be the one to give it to me," went on Jerry, as independently as ever.

Now it happened that Clarke was in a particularly bad humor, and in a twinkle he caught Jerry by the collar.

"I'll teach you to talk respectfully to your betters," he cried, shaking the boy roughly.

"Let go of me!" roared Jerry. "Let go, or I'll hit you!"

"I'll let go after you promise to behave yourself."

"I'won't promise anything," panted Jerry, and gave the luwyer a sudden push in the stomach that sent him sprawling on his back. The hold was broken, and Jerry leaped back to a safe distance.

"Hi! hi! you rascal!" puffed Dick Clarke, as

"Hi! h! you rascal!" puffed Dick Clarke, as he turned over and got up. "I'll warm you good for that!" And he shook his fist at Jerry.

"You will—if you can catch me," answered the boy, keeping at a safe distance.

"What do you mean by knocking me down?"

"You deserved the shaking."
"You od villain!"
"You young villain!"
"You young villain!"
"Here both stopped to glare at each other. Dick Clarke was boiling with rage, while Jerry felt like doubling up with laughter.

"If I was Squire Parkhurst, I wouldn't have you in my house a minute," continued the lawyer, not knowing what else to say.

"If you were the squire, I wouldn't stay with you a minute."

"What put you on a high horse, anyway?"
"I am not on a high horse—I'm on foot," and Jerry grinned.

Again Dick Clarke made a dash for the lad.

Jerry grinned.

Again Dick Clarke made a dash for the lad.

But Jerry was too nimble for him and easily kept out of his reach.

"Just you wait till I catch you!" called out

"If you touch me again, I'll complain to the squire."

"Indeed!"

"And I'll complain to Miss Mabel, too."

At this Dick Clarke's face changed color.

"See here, Jerry, I want to talk to you," he said, after a pause.

"All right, fire away," said the boy, but kept at a safe distance.

"Come closer. I don't want to yell like a bull!"

"Come closer. I don't want to yell like a bull."
"Thanks, but I didn't know bulls yelled. They generally bellow around here."
"You know what I mean. Do you think a good deal of Miss Mabel!"
"To be sure I do."
"That young Davenport comes to see her pretty often, doesn't he?"
"You had better ask her that question. It's none of my business. And now I've got to be off," continued Jerry, and went on his way, whistling a favorite air at the top of his wind power.
"A courloss boy" murmured the lawyer was."

thing a favorite air at the top of his wind power.

"A curious boy," murmured the lawyer, gasing after him. "How I would like to give him a dressing down!"

The encounter with the lawyer did not diminish Jerry's high spirits in the least, and his arrvial at Hill's Tavern found him still whistling merrily.

"Well. Jerry. what brings you?" demanded the landlord, knowing full well that the boy did not want a drink of liquor.

"I want to know if there are any letters for the folks at our place, Mr. Hill."

"Yes, there are," was the answer.

"Two for the squire and one for yourself."

"A letter for me!" gasped Jerry, fearing in

URING the two days that succeeded the death of Felix, Edna did not leave her room; and without her knowledge Mrs. Andrews administered opiates that stupefied her. Late on the morning of the third she awoke, and lay for some time trying to collect her thoughts.

Her mind was clouded, but gradually it cleared, and she strained her ears to distinguish the low words spoken in the apartment next to her own. She remembered, as in a feverish dream, all that passed on the night that Felix died; and pressing her hand over her aching forehead, she rose and sat on the edge of her bed.

The monotonous sounds in the neighboring room swelled louder for a few seconds, and now she heard very distinctly the words:

"And I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth."

She shivered, and wrapped around her shoulders a bright blue shawl that had been thrown over the foot of the bed.

Walking across the floor, she opened the door, and looked in.

The boy's body had been embalmed, and placed in a coffin which rested in the center of the room; and an English clergyman, a friend of Mr. Manning's, read the burial service.

Mrs. Andrews and Hattle were weeping in one corner and Mr. Manning leaned against the window, with his hand on Lila's curls. As the door swung open and Edna entered, he looked up.

Her dressing gown of gray merino trailed on the marble floor, and her hare feet gleamed window, with his hand on Lila's curis. As the door swung open and Edna entered, he looked up.

Her dressing gown of gray merino trailed on the marble floor, and her bare feet gleamed like ivory, as one hand caught up the soft merino folds sufficiently to enable her to walk. Over the blue shawl streamed her beautiful hair, making the wan face look even more ghastly by contrast with its glossy jet masses.

She stood irresolute, with her calm, mournful eyes riveted on the coffin, and Mr. Manning saw her pale lips move as she staggered toward it. He sprang to meet and intercept her, and she stretched her hands in the direction of the corpse, and smiled strangely, murmuring like one in a troubled dream:

"You need not be afraid, little darling, 'there is no night there.'"

She reeled and put her hand to her heart, and would have fallen, but Mr. Manning caught and carried her back to her room.

For two weeks she hovered on the borders of eternity; and often the anxious friends who watched her, felt that they would rather see her die than endure the suffering through which she was called to pass.

She bore it sliently, meekly, and when the danger seemed over, and she was able to sleep without the aid of narcotics, Mrs. Andrews could not bear to look at the patient white face, so hopelessly calm.

No allusion was made to Felix, even after she could not bear to look at the patient white face, so hopelessly calm. No allusion was made to Felix, even after she was able to sit up and drive; but once, when Mr. Manning brought her some flowers, she looked sorrowfully at the snowy orange-blossoms, whose strong perfume made her turn paler, and said faintly:

raintly:
"I shall never love them or violets again.
Take them away, Hattie, out of my sight; put them on your brother's grave. They smell of may have achieved is owing to hard, faithful work. I have received so many kind letters from children, that some time, if I live to be wise enough, I want to write a book especially for them. I am afraid to attempt it just now; for it requires more mature judgment and experience, and greater versatility of talent to write successfully for children than for grown persons. In the latter, one is privileged to assume native intelligence and cultivation; but the tender, untutored minds of the former permit no such margin; and this fact necessitates clearness and simplicity of style, and power of illustration that seem to me very rare. As yet, I am conscious of my incapacity for the mission of preparing juvenile books; but perhaps, if I study closely the characteristics of young people, I shall learn to understand them more thoroughly. So much depends on the proper training of our American youth, especially in view of the great political questions that now agitate the country, that I confess I feel some anxiety on the subject."

"But, Edna, you will not adhere to your resolution of keeping silent. The public is a merciless taskmaster; your own ambition will scourge you on; and having once put your hand to the literary plough, you will not be allowed to look back."

"Yes, sir; but the that plougheth should helper his book of the subject in the control of the proper training acquainting herself with the statistics of them, consequently she was never so happy as when the recipient of letters from the poor women of the land, who thanked her for the subject in the control of the morality of the community, in which they unblushingly violated most dangerous fees to the morality of the community, in which they unblushingly violated morality with the train with the train to write to write the tower and the world honored and trusted her, Edna gave no heed to solve the promptings of her womanly intuitions.

At length, when Mr. Manning rose to say good night, he looked gravely at the governess, and asked:

"Edna, cannot Lila take the vacant place in your sad heart?"

"It is not vacant, sir. Dear memories walk to and fro therein, weaving garlands of immorielles—singing sweet tunes of days and years—that can never die. Hereafter, I shall endeavor to entertain the precious guests I have already, and admit no more. The past is the realm of my heart; the present and future the kingdom where my mind must dwell, and my hands labor."

With a sigh he went away, and she took up the letters and began to read them. Many were from strangers, and they greatly cheered and encouraged her; but finally she opened one, whose superscription had until this instant escaped her cursory glance. It was from Mr. Hammond, and contained an account of Mr. Murray's ordination. She read and reread it, with a half-bewildered expression in her countenance, for the joy seemed far too great for credence. She looked again at the date and signature, and passing her hand over her brow, wondered if there could be any mistake. The paper fell into her lap, and a cry of delight rang through the room.

"Saved—purified—consecrated to God's holy work? A minister of Christ? O most merciful God! I thank Thee! My prayers are answered with a blessing I never dared to hope for, or even to dream of! Can I ever, ever be grateful enough? A pastor, holding up pure hands! Thank God! my sorrows are all ended now; there is no more grief for me. Ah! what a glory breaks upon the future! What though I never see his face in this world? I can be pattent indeed; for now I know, oh! I know that I shall surely see it yonder!"

She sank on her knees at the open window, and wept for the first time since Felix died. Happy, happy tears mingled with broken words of rejocing, that seemed a foretaste of heaven.

Her heart was so full of graitude and exultation that she could not sleep, and she sat down and looked over the sea, while her face was radiant and tremulous. The transition fr railiery and envious malice, but resolutely obeyed the promptings of her womanly intuitions.

Painful experience had taught her the imprudence, the short-sighted policy of working until very late at night; and in order to take due care of her health, she wisely resorted to a different system of study, which gave her more sleep, and allowed her some hours of daylight for her literary labors.

In the industrial pursuits of her own sex she was intensely interested, and spared no trouble in acquainting herself with the statistics of those branches of employment already open to them; consequently she was never so happy as when the recipient of letters from the poor women of the land, who thanked her for the words of hope, advice, and encouragement which she constantly addressed to them.

While the world honored her, she had the precious assurance that her Christian country-women loved and trusted her. She felt the painful need of Mr. Manning's society, and even his frequent letters did not fully satisfy her; but as he had resolved to remain in Europe, at least for some years, she bore the irreparable loss of his counsel and sympathy, as she bore all other privations, bravely and quietly.

Now and then alarming symptoms of the old suffering warned her of the uncertainty of her life; and after much deliberation, feeling that her time was limited, she commenced another book.

Mr. Hammond wrote, begging her to come to book.

Mr. Hammond wrote, begging her to come to him, as he was now hopelessly infirm and confined to his room; but she shrank from a return to the village so intimately associated with events which she wished if possible to forget; and, though she declined the invitation, she proved her affection for her venerable teacher, by sending him every day a long, cheerful letter.

by sending him every day a long, cheerful letter.

Since her departure from the parsonage, Mrs. Murray had never written to her; but through Mr. Hammond's and Huldah's letters, Edna learned that Mr. Murray was the officiating minister in the church which he had built in his boyhood; and now and then the old pastor painted pictures of life at Le Bocage, that brought happy tears to the orphan's eyes. She heard from time to time of the good the new minister was accomplishing among the poor; of the beneficial influence he exerted, especially over the young men of the community; of the charitable institutions to which he was devoting a large portion of his fortune; of the love and respect, the golden opinions he was winning from those whom he had formerly estranged by his sarcastic bitterness.

One darling rose-hued dream of her life was to establish a free school and circulating library in the village of Chattanoora; and keeping this hope ever in view, she had denied herself all superfluous luxuries, and jealously hoarded her savings.

She felt now that, should she become an in-seemed indeed unearthly; and the faint, delicate blush on her cheeks deepened and burned, as with a quivering cry of gladness that told volumes, she hid her face in her hands.

He came nearer, and the sound of his low, mellow voice thrilled her heart as no other music ever had done.

"Edna, have you a right to refuse me forgiveness, when the blood of Christ has purified me from the guilt of other years?"

She trembled and said brokenly:

"Mr. Murray—you never wronged me—and I have nothing to forgive."

"ho you still believe me an unprincipled hypocrite?"

"Oh! no, no, no!"

"Bo you believe that my repentance has been sincere, and acceptable to my insulted God? Ho you believe that I am now as faithfully endeavoring to serve Him, as a remorseful man possibly can?"

"I hope so, Mr. Murray."

"Edna, can you trust me now?"

Some seconds elapsed before she answered, and then the words were scarcely audible.

"I trust you."

"Thank God!"

There was a brief pause, and she heard a heavily-drawn sigh escape him.

"Thank God!"
There was a brief pause, and she heard a heavily-drawn sigh escape him.

"Edna, it is useless to tell you how devotedly I love you, for you have known that for years; and yet you have shown my love no mercy. But perhaps if you could realize how much I need your help in my holy work, how much more I could accomplish in the world if you were with me, you might listen, without steeling yourself against me, as you have so long done. Las minime, you might listen, without steeling yourself against me, as you have so long done. Las minime, you got the me and him as only you can ? Oh, my darling, my darling, come to me."

He stood within two feet of her, but he was—too humble? Nay, nay, too proud to touch her without permission.

Her hands fell from her crimson checks, and she looked up at the countenance of her king.

In her fond eyes he seemed mobile and sandshe looked up at the countenance of her king.

In her fond eyes he seemed mobile and sandshe looked up at the countenance of her king.

'Oh! I trust you! I trust you fully!"

Standing in the close, tender clasp of his strong arms, she listened to a narration of his grief and loneliness, his hopes and fears, his desolation and struggles and prayers during their long separation. Then for the first time she learned that he had come more than once to New York, solely to see her, having exaction the promise from Minch and the counter had acquainted him with all that had ever passed between them on the subject of his unsuccessful suit; and during her solourn in Europe, had kept him regularly advised of the state of her health.

As Mr. Hammond was not able to take the fatiguing journey North, and Edna would not permit anyone else to perform her marriage ceremony, she sent Mr. Murray home without her, promising to come to the parsonage as early as promising to come to the possible.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrews were deeply pained by the intelligence of her approaching departure, and finally consented to accompany her on by the intelligence of her approaching departure, and finally consented to accompany her on her journey.

The last day of the orphan's sojourn in New York was spent at the quiet spot where Felix slept his last sleep; and it caused her keen grief to bid good by to his resting-place, which was almost as dear to her as the grave of her grandfather. Their affection had been so warm, so sacred, that she clung fondly to his memory; and it was not until she reached the old village depot, where carriages were waiting for the party, that the shadows of that day entirely left her countenance.

In accordance with her own request, Edna did not see Mr. Murray again until the hour appointed for their marriage.

It was a bright, beautiful afternoon, warm with sunshine, when she permitted Mrs. Murray to lead her into the study where the party had assembled. Mr. and Mrs. Andrews, Hattie, liuidah, and the white-haired pastor, were all there, and when Edna entered, Mr. Murray advanced to meet her, and received her hand from his mother.

The orphan's eyes were bent to the floor, and never lifted, even when the trembling voice of her beloved pastor pronounced her St. Elmo Murray's wife. The intense pallor of her face frightened Mrs. Andrews, who watched her with suspended breath, and once moved eagerly to ward her. Mr. Murray felt her lean more heavily against him during the ceremony; and, now turning to take her in his arms, he saw that her eyelashes had fallen on her cheeks—she had lost all consciousness of what was passing.

Two hours elapsed before she recovered fully from the attack; and when the blood showed itself again in lips that were kissed so repeatedly, Mr. Murray lifted her from the sofa in the study, and passing his arm around her, said:

"Today I snap the fetters of your literary bondage. There shall be no more books written! No more study, no more toil, no more public you love so well, must even help itself, and whistle for a new pet. You belong solely (continued on page 18.)

Dear Madam:

This magnificent gold lace breakfast set will cost you the freight charges and a kind word of recommendation, and that is absolutely all it will ever cost you.

his brief sojourns. Thus were laid the foundations of an intense and absorbing devotion to her father that gradually became the dominant factor in her life.

"Nutwood"—the three-storied red brick house crowning an eminence shaded by walnut and chestnut trees—had been built in 1825 by General Maurice's father, and its pillared plazza running along three sides overlooked the city of Y—, two miles distant, where spires and factory chimneys lifted their lines against mellow western skies. On the first and second floors of the old mansion wide halls crossed at right angles, admitting breezes from every point of the compass, and so unusually thick were the walls that the nearly square windows framed in cedar furnished comfortable lounging seats. For many years this place had been famous throughout the State for its race-horses, game chickens, pointers, fox-hounds, and fine library, and the hospitality dispensed was peculiar to an era characterized by conditions that the Civil War annihilated. No invading army had reached the city of Y——, but raiding cavairy squads once completely sacked the Maurice plantations many miles distant in the river valley, and burned not only the empty gin house, but the commodious family residence often occupied in autumn. Prior to her departure for Europe Mrs. Maurice had rebuilt gin and ware houses, and erected a pretty four-room cottage comfortably furnished, which, with fifty acres of adjoining land, she gave as dower to Eliza when she married the faithful overseer and manager of the "Bend Plantation."

One sultry spring morning in Eglah's ninth year, she sat with Eliza in the "out-door school-room" where lessons were studied in warm veather. It was a cool retreat—a circular, latticed summer-house—overrum by yellow wood-bine, honeysuckle, and a pink multiflora rose, all in full bloom, busy distilling perfume their satin lips offered in libation to the lazily wandering wind that caresed them. The pointed roof was rain proof, the floor tiled, and between the arched openings seats were fa her head supported by arms resting on the map, but once she turned a leaf, and the wind fluttered a letter many weeks old from her father.

"Are you ready to answer the map questions?"

"No, Ma-Lila. Why must I always answer ther people's questions, when nobody answers mine? I will say my lesson when you tell me what 'scallawag' and 'carpet-bagger' mean."

"They are ugly slang words, and if I were ou I should try to forget I ever heard them. ittle girls have nothing to do with politics, and you have not told me of whom the Graham hildren were speaking at the party."

"Never mind about names. I looked in the letionary, but could not find 'scallawag.' I know it means something horrid and vulgar and lateful, and I never will go to another party."

Eliza's reply was drowned by the scream of King Herod'—a lordly peacock that had earned he title from his slaughter of young turkeys and hickens in the poultry yard. Now he trailed is feathers across the walk, came up to the infection of the succession.

"Something happened a while ago, when a nan rode up the avenue and tied his horse. Now he is leaving the steps, and Herod knows he is a stranger. "Dear madam, I thank God for anything that will make you open your heart and take the precious child in. In many ways she needs tenderness from you, and especially since the children's parties she has attended recently, where rude things were said about her father. She has not told me all, but you know the damaging rumors about some of his decisions while Federal Judge in our State, and the Graham children, whose interests suffered through him, speak very bitterly of his career. Eglah has asked me many questions lately, which I always evaded, but she broods over this matter and is resentful."

"Poor little thing! Her father has lived on sour grapes so long, her teeth must inevitably be on edge. Henceforth she belongs to me." "She is absolutely devoted to him, and it is distressing to know how her very heartstrings are tied around him. It amounts to idolatry."

"Yes, I realize that, and it will be a sad day for her when the graphour fades and she sees the ugly, deformed clay feet of her idol." "It would break her heart."

"No. We both know sorrow does not destroy, and death is deaf to calls from crushed to a galling sense of shame. A gush of genuine tenderness warmed the old lady's heart as she took the quivering fingers, spread them on her own palm, and touched the girl's forehead with her lips.

"Loyal and true—that is the Maurice motto Though He slay me, yet will I trust llim." Today we will have no lessopedady to meet the gentleman. Mr. Horotot, whom your father wishes you to know. Eliza, see that she haw a warm bath, and put some orange flower water in her glass of lemonade."

In after years Noel Herriott often recalled that afternoon spent at Nutwood. The liminitable courtesy of the handsome stately hostess, the sweet countenance of the widowed foster-mother—whose anxious, tender gaze rarrely left the white-clad child—the grave negro butler, wearing linen apron that mattend his gray head, and the spaceous on decedar-walnscotted dining-room light of wax candless was reflected in silver dishes and candelabra, and glittered from heavy, antique-shaped, cut-glass bowls, while golden honey-comb and ripe strawberries mixed their fragrance with the breath of crimson carnations heaped in a Sevres china centerpiece that once graced banquets at Trianon. Most vivid of all impressions, he retained the imperishable image of a beautiful girl, with singularly white cheeks and lustrous, shy eyes, glo

WHERE ETERNAL PEACE SET ITS BLESSED SEAL.

The quiet, systematic routine of life at Nutwood was by no means cloistral in its seclusion, and though the term "house-party" had not yet taken root south of the Potomac, guests from various parts of the State frequently spent a week with Mrs. Maurice, and were entertained at dinners, luncheons, and teas with the lavish hospitality traditional in the family. Accustomed early to meeting strangers, Eglah was neither bashful nor awkward, but she understood fully that her father was unpopular in the social world around her, and she deeply resented an antipathy which, though never discussed in her presence, she felt it impossible to forgive or remove. The explanatory assistance of Minerva, daughter of the cook had enabled her to comprehend all the unpleasant significance of "scallawag" and "carpet-bagger," and with the fervor of indignant loyalty she promptly espoused whatever cause her father was reputed to represent. Alert and en garde, she expected attacks, felt eager to retailate, and consequently was often stung by the young people of her circle with whom she was no favorite. For many months after Judge Kent's second marriage, Mrs. Maurice yielded to a new and yearning tenderness toward her grandchild, whom she heartily pitied, but the overtures came too late; the plastic season had passed, the angles had stiffened, the childish heart had hardened hopelessly, and caresses that formerly might have won her love were received in cold, irresponsive passiveness.

Once she had gone under Eliza's care to spend Christmas in Washington, and though the pretty, gay, good-natured stepmother laid slege to the girl's heart and fondled and pampered her, Mrs. Kent knew from the deflant gleam in her watchful, jealous eyes that the daughter would never tolerate a usurper who sat on her own mother's throne and divided her father's affections.

During the following year, Mrs. Maurice was prostrated by an attack of pneumonia that resulted in heart weakness, from which she ne with the ebbling of summer tide her pulse waned slowly but steadily, like a star going down to the gates of the west. Leaning heavily on her husband's cane, followed by the aged pointer, the tall, wasted figure went to and fro through the old house, as one having packed and waiting for departure looks to see if aught has been forgotten: and over the pallid face with its cloud of black hair an exultant smile sometimes shone, as she realized how soon she should reclaim her treasures in the beckening Beyond. It was an August night when the pilots signal came, and swiftly and gladly she "crossed the bar". Eliza was aroused from a sound sleep by Eglah, who shook her.

"Ma-Lila, I am so frightened! I heard grandma cail out 'Egbert!' 'Marcia!' Something had slready waked me suddenly."

"She sprang up and lighted a candle, but the girl clung to her.

"No, it was not a dream. I heard it clear and loud like a quick cry. I was so scared I waited a while, and then I went to her room—but she is not there! I could see the bed was empty, because Dinah had left the night lamp burning in the pasage. What can it mean?"

"Grandmother is often restless, and goes out on the colonnade, where the fresh air relleves her oppressed breathing. No doubt she is there row. Baby, do not tremble so."

Clutching Eliza's nightgown, Eglah followed her to the sick room, which was unoccupied, and waking Dinah, who slept on a cot in the plazza, the foster-mother shielding the light with her hand. Turning to reenter the house, they were startled by the howl of a dog, answered instantly by a scream from Herod, roosting on one of the arched chimney tops.

directed envelope; social, friendly letters, just to wile away the time is another matter altogether. Here comes a letter from a dear little girl:

"J. A. D. What shall I do. I wrote a letter to the corner soliciting correspondence, stating that I would answer all letters. I have received four hundred and fifty, and they are still coming." There you are, be careful how we make such promises, we are such an immense family, and very sociable, want to get acquainted, chat, and visit together, but it costs money, so we must look well into our pocket-books before writing to the corner and promising to "answer all letters." This little lady referred to is very conscientious, and believes in doing just what she says she will, but in this case she positively cannot.

Our dear friend Alice Geiger of Libby Mont., writes me:

"COMFORT always was good, but like old cheese is improving with age. I love to stroll in the woods alone, when not a sound is to be heard to break the stillness, nothing but the distant murmur of the river, ever flowing on and on. I have just completed my first piece of Battenburg." Thanks, Alice, for the pansy seed. Miss Elsie G. Peters, Quaker City, Ohio, thinks she could not exist without COMFORT. She is enjoying the music, very much as she is a musician. Don't spend too much time over that patchwork, Elsie dear; if you have a cough, get outdoors into God's blessed pure air; if you must do fancy work, bundle up and sit outside. I should like to see that "Ragged Star" quilt after it is finished.

Salt-rising Bread

One pint new milk put on the stove and stir into it enough corn meal to make as thick as mush. Set in a warm place all night. In the morning it should be light, put the flour in a bowl, pour in the mush and mix with warm milk and water equal parts: add one tablespoonful of sugar; one teaspoonful of salt, and a pinch of soda (always dissolve soda in a little water before adding to any mixture). Make a stiff batter, cover and keep warm. In an hour it should be light. Work in flour to make stiff dough, let it rise, mold in loaves, let rise again and bake.

Dear Editor and Sisters:

I thank my many friends for the cards, postals, letters, books and magazines, that I have received, and regret I could not answer each one personally, but have not been able, and I do thank each one for their kindness. I hope you all will still remember me, as I am a great sufferer and confined to my bed; anything would be appreciated to help pass the lonely hours.

be appreciated to help pass the lonely hours.

MRS, A. C. HOTTINGER, Hebron, Ohio.

DEAR FRIENDS, ONE AND ALL:

I want to thank you each for the kindness and sympathy you have shown me, in cheering my lonely life with letters and reading matter. One lady in Wisconsin subscribed for dear old Comfort for me, I could not make out her name. I was not taking Comfort, and I thank her so much. I received a dear kind letter from Mrs. Moffet of Oklahoma, and some interesting reading, also from others who did not give their names. I think Comfort has the noblest band of readers of any paper published. They show their interest and sympathy for the unfortunate by deeds as much as words.

My wish is that each day may bring blessings to each one of our band, and to all who have favored me I would say, remember there is one among the rugged hills of Texas who often thinks of her kind, unknown friends, and has enjoyed their thoughtfulness and kindness more than they will ever know.

Dear Comfort:

I want to thank the dear sisters and cousins for their kindness to me. I have received nearly two hundred letters, cards, and packages of papers, and many nice pieces for my quilts and fancy work. My health is better now, but I still want you to remember me in your prayers. Through these columns I have surely received comfort, inexpressible. "Stanwix! you here?" he exclaimed.

I felt anxlous, you know, about the result of your negotiations—an old man's weakness. And, by the wav, you may as well just return me those documents. Not that I distrust you, my dear boy, but something might happen to you."
Harold took the papers, which we have seen him exhibit to Everton, from his pocket, and handed them to the old man, who carefully counted them.
"All here, all here, my dear boy," he said as he deposited them in an inner pocket. "You're an honest lad; but one might have fancied from the way you gave them up that you'd have liked to keep them. But don't be too ambitious, dear boy, or you'll ruin all. You'll get your share for all you do."

"He wants the papers."

"He can't have them just yet."

"I told him so."

"Well, what else?"

"He wants the girl removed."

"Aha! now we are getting down to business. What will he pay?"

"Half his fortune—a cool million."

"Good! he can afford to. Of course you didn't tell him where the girl was to be found?"

Madge Mason had been in her new position three days, and she believed herself the happiest girl in New York.

Probably she was.
She was succeeding well in her work, and she had a new home—one far better than any she had ever had before.

Mrs. Straight had fitted up a little hall room for her in the flat.

It was a plain-enough place, and many a girl would have turned up her nose at it, but to this poor child of the streets it was a paradise.

She was so happy and contented that she almost feared she would awaken and find it all a dream.

She was so happy and contented that she almost feared she would awaken and find it all a dream.

At last some one cared for her!
Ah! what is the glitter of gold to the sunshine of honest, loving hearts?

Madge's first thought when she was installed in her new position was to get her old friend, Dave Lane, a chance in the bindery, too.
She spoke to Ralph about it, and the next day Dave entered upon his new duties, as proud and important as if he owned the whole place.

At noon on the third day of Madge's connection with the establishment, Alice Straight remained at her bench to do a little extra work after the other girls had gone out to dinner.

A big printing establishment in the same building was still in operation, and next Alice's seat was a slowly-revolving wheel encircled by a belt.

"Better look out, Miss Alice," shouted Dave as he passed the door on his way to dinner, noticing that Alice's long, golden hair was blowing dangerously near the belt, "or yer hair'll git caught in dat machinery an' away yer'll go."

"I'm all right, Dave," laughed Alice, intent on her work.

As Dave was about to descend the next flight of stairs a well-dressed young man confronted him.

As Dave was about to descend the next hight of stairs a well-dressed young man confronted him.

Had he been familiar with the features of the Four Hundred he would have recognized Mr. Shirley Everton.

"Aw! boy," drawled the millionaire, "is there a young woman named Madge Mason working in this place?"

"Madge has got a swell mash!" thought Dave. Then he asked aloud:

"Would yer know her if yer saw her, mister?"

"Aw! no."

"Well, that's her."

And Dave pointed to Alice.
"She'll be able ter defend herself," he mused, as he rushed down stairs four steps at a time, for he was hungry. "Dat's one fer his nibs."

Everton was about to accost Alice when the young girl's hair became entagled in the belt. Realizing that her position was one of the greatest peril, Alice shrieked aloud for help.

"Luck's in my favor!" muttered Everton. "By Jove! I sha'n't have to sacrifice the money after all. In two minutes she'll be out of my way forever."

Alice's shriek was heard by but one person beside Everton—Madge Mason.

Scarcely had the cry been uttered when the young girl came rushing out of the foldingroom.

She rushed toward them, intending to cut Alice's hair and thus release her.

But Everton, understanding her purpose, seized her in a firm grasp.

"Wait!" he hissed in her ear.

"Let me go!" cried Madge, frantically.
"Don't you see—"

"I'll let you go," said Everton, "in one minute—but not before."

In one minute Alice would be beyond human.

Here's Happy Family.

of entertainment have fled. Every way to bring joy and cheerfulness has been exhausted. At those times father and mother begin to wonder what can times father and mother begin to wonder what can be done to keep the boys and girls at home. It is a serious problem, but it must be met in every household. Young folks need something more than the things which have kept the older ones entertained. There is no father nor mother who does not want to keep the children at home, entertain them at home, take away the dullness and make them feel at home. I don't believe you could find better entertainment for the home and for your children than that which is pictured here. Surely there is no lack of joy with such scenes occuring nightly.

In every home there comes a time when all means

This man has provided an Edison Phonograph with Edison Gold Moulded records for his family. Tonight they are enjoying a minstrel show. If father, mother, baby and sons did not know that the music came from an Edison Phonograph they would be willing to SWEAR that the singers were in the same room with them.

Tomorrow night they will have a band concert interspersed with beautiful operatic songs. The next night they will hear the beautiful chimes of Trinity just as they have been heard by thousands of tourists awed by their sublime beauty. They will hear also the wonderful violin solo with harp accompaniment and a Wagnerian piano recital. Where is there a chance for any misery to creep into this home?

is there a chance for any misery to creep into this home?

Music has a strange and fascinating power. It moves the human race to great and dignified actions. Why is it that in the heat of battle the regimental bands strike up the liveliest and the fiercest airs? It is to fire the soldiers with an enthusissm that even the bravest could not feel if it were not for the stirring music. Do you remember what the American band played at El Caney? A "Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," and with a cheer the American troops swarmed over the hill sweeping the Spaniards before them. Who can deny the charm there is in music? You may hear great military bands in YOUI. HOME. An Edison Phonograph will bring them there. You may have a free trial no matter where you live.

On the back page you will find a detailed account of the wonderful Edison Phonograph. You can make no mistake if you buy this instrument.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered a this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month,

OW are the dog-days when all of us must swelter and perspire and think how pleasant are the sharp cold days of Winter, but cousins, dear, don't you remember when it was cold we wanted it hot? Of course, you do, and so have all the cousins of other years, and so have all the cousins of other years, and so have all the cousins of other years, and sons shall be. But let us be as happy as we can with what we have and if we try real hard we may be as happy as anybody ever gets in this world, which is right happy sometimes, don't you think? Even when we have to work when we do not want to. So let us go to work.

The first letter is from Cousin Marie of Buckner, Mo., who is in much trouble because she is engaged to two men who refuse to give her up it once to devote herself to a third man whom the thinks she loves. Really it is hard lines for Cousin Marie, and since she has got herself into this trouble, I guess I'll let her get herself out of it. I don't like girls who become engaged to two men at the same time.

July Bride, Avoca, Minn.—Wait till you are twenty-one, then you will know whether you should marry a man who drinks. Love him, if you want to, but don't marry him to reform him.

him.

Brown-eyed Susan, Aurora, Ind.—He is vulgar and does not mean well. Maybe you can reform him, but you cannot by kissing him. Suppose you try more stringent measures and teach him first, good manners. (2) If you really ove the man who proposes to you, you will not "put him off to see if he will act anxious."

Brown Eyes, Oak Grove, Mo.—Do you think he loves you very much if he goes on living his reckless life and you don't want him to? Can't you find someone to love you whose love means something? (2) Stop loving the man who marries another, and treat him and his wife as friends. marries ar as friends.

Dot, Buffalo, N. Y.—What you need, my dear, is a little plain common sense. The young man should have answered your letter but did not, and now he wants to explain and apologize. You will not listen to him simply because you think he slighted you. Now that is neither sensible nor Christian. Accept his apology and be friends again. At the same time let him understand that he must use common sense, too. He needs it is much as you do.

Inhappy Girl. Cordova. Ala—You are quite Unhappy Girl, Cordova, Ala.—You are quite right in keeping the watch until the young man himself asks you to return it. The matter is entirely between you and him.

entirely between you and him.

Sweet Seventeen, Kitzmillerville, Md.—Don't be too anxious about him, and don't let yourself fall too much in love with him until he asks you to marry him. He may mean all right, but let him prove it. Let him come to see you once or twice a week, and every now and then you have an engagement so he cannot come. Keep him on the anxious seat, not yourself. You may accept small presents from him, but nothing valuable.

valuable.

M. E. C., Williamsburg, Ia.—If he is the gentleman of education and fine breeding you say he is, he is certainly not the kind who will appreciate a girl who knows him only by sight and "loves him just to look at him," and proposes to capture him in her own way. Gentlemen are not looking for that sort of girls, neither are they apt to answer the letter of a girl they do not know. If you cannot meet him properly do not meet him at all. He'll find a way if he wants to know you.

E. E. Metralf, Ill—Don't get lost again when

F. F., Metcalf, Ill.—Don't get lost again wher you go driving and don't go driving again with that same beau for a year at least. That wil prove to your Pa and others that you really did get lost. But I don't believe your beau got Little Chick, Knoll, Kans.—Don't marry at eighteen, unless you are much more mature than most girls at that age. He is twice your age now, and that is too old, but when you are twenty he will be only eighteen years older than you which is not at all too old, if he is the young sort.

Sweet Sixteen, Mission Valley, Texas.—Ask the young man what he means by putting his arm around you. In the mean time don't let him do it unless he is engaged to you. A man may come to see his girl as often as she wants him to, if nobody objects.

to, if nobody objects.

Dimples, Lawrence, Mich.—If your sweetheart dancing with another girl in the set gets a chance to squeeze your hand and does it, you may do as you please about returning it. Most girls would squeeze back, just a weenty teenty bit, anyhow. That isn't very naughty, but you do not have to kiss him how d' y' and good by, io you? Suppose you postpone that until you become engaged? What isn't proper now, will be proper then.

Lillie, Thurman, Neb.—The girl may quite properly pin a flower on a man's coat, whether he coaxes her to or not, and though others are present. (2) Gentlemen do not wink at ladies. (3) I don't know what the letters mean.

Eves Washingtonhoro Pa -If h one girl badly he will be apt to be no less car ful of another, and I think, you should choose better company.

earthly good and somebody ought to take a club to him.

Nineteen, Los Angeles, Cal.—You should have friends, even if you do work hard and are too tired to exert yourself in the evening. Try to be cheerful at your work and make friends among those who work with you. Don't wait for people to make you cheerful, but you try to make others cheerful. It will be hard at first, but you will soon get the habit and people will like you. (2) The lady should ask the man to call. (3) When you are out with your chum and her husband at their invitation he should pay the way. If you go out often with them, you should have an understanding that you pay your own way.

Rosie, Loysville, Pa.—Well, you are a silly girl to fall in love with a wandering picture agent you never saw before and who merely tried to sell you a picture. And what is worse for you he would think you a good deal sillier than I 60. Still you write a good letter and have plenty of plain common sense. Use that in your love affairs and be sensible. (2) Your mother did right in letting the young man know it was time for him to go home. You did better than the other girl.

Bright Eyes, Ohio, Ill.—Thirty-seven is not too old for twenty-two.

Bright Eyes, Ohio, Ill.—Thirty-seven is not too old for twenty-two. (2) Tobacco chewing is not nice, but it is hardly sufficient cause for parents to offer against their daughter marrying the chewer, everything else being all right. (3) Ordinarily the man leads the way. The lady may lead if she knows the way better.

Blue Bell, Duluth, Minn.—It was all right to be friendly with the young fellow and it is all right to go to dances that are nice. It is proper for your intended brother in law to stop and take you to your sister to go to a dance.

Patience, Dilworth, Texas.—It seems to me that the young man is neglecting you. Perhaps he doesn't know he is, but he is. He should not let his work interfere with his attention to you, at least enough to let you see he cares for you. Give him a little plain talk on the subject and do not be afraid to say what you think. You have rights that he is bound to respect.

spect.

Wondering Girl, Starksville, Miss.—It is merely a filtration and both of you might as well firt it out. Neither will be much hurt, I guess.

May Rose, Devil's Lake, N. D.—You should not marry your cousin, and he knows you should not. In most states it is no marriage at all. I fancy he will get over it. You marry somebody else, and give him a chance to try.

R. C., Wilding, W. Va.—Obey your parents about marrying. When you are of age you may do as you please, which doesn't mean that you will marry happily. It is not wise to marry a man whose reputation is not perfectly straight, no matter if you do love him.

Forgetmenot, Norfolk, Conn.—There is nothing for you to do but brave it out as you have been doing. You are foolish to love on hopelessly, the man not caring enough for you to bother his head, or his heart, about you for a minute, and nothing I can say will do any good. By and by, when you can get away, the change will be of benefit.

Bluebells, Cedarville, Ill.—Marry the man and good and the suppose the property of the proper change will be of benefit.

Bluebells, Cedarville, Ill.—Marry the man and get away from the home where you are unhappy. You can't make things much more uncomfortable than they now are and you are entitled to a chance to try for something better.

Violet, Linton, Ind.—Go on working where you are and when all is ready go to Indianapolis and marry the young man. Don't have anybody at the wedding except the necessary persons, and start out in your new life entirely on your own account and your husband's.

account and your husband's.

W. T. E. M., Pumpkin Center, Ia.—I think the older man really loves you while the other only thinks he does. In any event the older one wants to marry you and the other is not sure. The twenty-eight-year-old chap is not anything like as reliable as the thirty-six-year-old one, and you are old enough for the older man. My advice is to marry him, but I shall not insist, if you want the other.

Rosey, New Carlisle, Ind.—Nineteen and twenty-one is rather young to marry, especially as a twenty-one-year-old boy is not a man yet. Suppose you wait a couple of years and see if both of you aren't glad you waited.

Sad Heart. Cumberland City, Tenn.—Second

Sad Heart, Cumberland City, Tenn.—Second cousins may marry, but it is ever so much better to go out of the family to marry. You are silly enough now without marrying your cousin.

There, dears, all your questions are answered and I do hope the advice I have given about some of you getting married will be followed. But if it is or not, I surely wish you all well, and may the good Lord watch over us till we meet again. By, by,

Good Old Songs We All Love.

By special request from many of our readers we print the words of a few songs and will continue to do so each month as space allows. We invite, our readers to send in the words of popular old songs which they think would please our six millions of readers. In copying, give each line of poetry a line by itself, do not run it in, as though solid. Please write on one side of paper only.

Take This Letter to My Mother

Take this letter to my mother.
Far across the deep blue sea,
It will fill her heart with pleasure,
She'll be glad to hear from me.
How she wept when last we parted,
How her heart was filled with pain,
When she said, "Good by, God bless you—
We may never meet again."

CHORUS.

Take this letter to my mother, Far across the deep blue sea, It will fill her heart with pleasure, She'll be glad to hear from me.

Take this letter to my mother,
It will fill her heart with joy,
Tell her that her prayers are answered,
God protects her darling boy;
Tell her to be glad and cheerful,
Pray for me where'er I roam,
And ere long I'll turn my footsteps,
Back towards my dear old home.

CHORUS.

Take this letter to my mother,
It is filled with words of love;
If on earth I'll never meet her,
Tell her that we'll meet above.
Where there is no hour of parting,
All is peace and love and joy;
God bless my dear old mother,
And protect her darling boy.

Yours in Sunshine. MRS. SOPHA ENNIS.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I saw Comfort advertised in a paper 10 days ago. I sent for sample copy received Comfort Friday night. I got 21 people to subscribe for Comfort in one hour Saturday. In any town, village or city it is possible to get practically everybody to subscribe for Comfort. Everybody that I have asked to take the paper has done so except one and I will land him if I have to pay for his subscription. I will never let up until I get every family in Narcoossee on my list, at least 50. Now why could not other sisters follow my plan, think what an enormous circulation Comfort would have. Suppose every subscriber got 50 subscribers that would give Comfort a circulation of $2,500,000. Now sisters, Narcoossee is about as small a place as you will find anywhere. Nothing here but a post-office and two stores and yet I got 21 actual boni fide subscribers in one hour late Saturday night, and will get fifty and perhaps more. Even if you got no prize at all it is worth while to introduce Comfort into new homes, because Comfort is doing a great work under the able management of our good friend, the Publisher. Now dear sisters do try. Get your boys and girls to bring in subscribers. Every man, woman, boy and girl among your circle of acquaintances will give you 20 cents for a year's subscription to Comfort and that entities you to a button and a League card. If you do not know how to go about it I will gladly tell you. It is simple and the prizes are well worth your trouble. I feel sure that every reader is a friend of the paper and every new subscriber sate will worth your trouble. A good many sisters ask for recipes for canning tomatoes. See that fruit is sound and ripe. Pour boiling water on tomatoes and skin will peel off, pack solid in two or three cans. Exhants eight minutes, cook 20 minutes. Other fruits and vegetables require more or less time to be perfect. Tomatoes will keep in any place, heat, cold, or light has no effect. Sour krout is good canned.

Editor of Comport:
A friend of mine, gave me a copy of Comport to read the other day, and I liked it so well that I want to subscribe, and herewith inclose 20 cents, 15 cents being for the subscription, and five cents for the letter, button and card which I want very much. After reading Comport I just wanted to write a letter so badly to the dear sisters and cousins that I just had to sit right down and subscribe so that I could have the privilege of so doing.

MRS. P. A. WINCHELL. Narcoossee, Fla.

Here are a few extracts from Mrs. Ennis' characteristic letters, here given as received to convince you of her earnestness and accomplishments.

EDITOR OF COMPORT:

Here's another: Inclosed please find twenty cents for subscription to COMPORT and button and card to League. This makes four subscriptions I have sent you today. That's plugging some.

And another letter:

EDITOR OF COMPORT:
Herewith please find inclosed twenty cents for subscription, League Membership, Card and Button. This makes two subscriptions I have obtained today, besides my own that I send today. I'm hustling hard for you down here, had no trouble in getting these two. I like COMFORT fine.

And yet another:

Here is another batch of subs, this makes 18 today since four o'clock. I think your paper is a treasure and I am going to plug just as hard as I can. I will never let up until everybody in our town takes COMFORT. Inclosed is money order for this club.

And still they come:

Herewith please find inclosed three more subscriptions to Componer and League Memberships. This makes twenty-six paid for subs. that I have sent you in 24 hours. How's that for a scrub canvasser, just talking to friends between meals?

And now COMFORT readers, can't you do as well?
This good woman is not alone working for COMFORT, but she is doing a great good work among intelligent people who appreciate every line and every

A Post Card Album

That Will Hold Fifty Cards.

Our fifty-card Album is the most attractive on the market. On each page two cards may be displayed; the leaves are very heavy rigid paper stock of a heavy green shade, providing a very tasty and attractive background for all cards, and when two pages are opened together showing four cards, the appearance is extremely attractive, and one cannot neatly preserve a collection of Post Cards unless they are displayed in an Album. And better still, a very nice collection of Souvenir Postal Cards represents the individual and personal thought of absent or distant relatives and friends and they are very entertaining for visitors who enjoy looking them over; so, that in an Album, arranged in order, they are readily accessible and may be examined time after time with mo harm to the Cards, and thus preserved in remembrance of the senders. No one thinks of collecting Souvenir Cards without an Album. Everyone wants an Album and the demand, just now, exceeds the supply. We are fortunate in having a great quantity on hand of first-class Albums which we are to distribute as premiums to those who will send us clubs of subscribers to this magazine as per our offer below.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbid-ding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT readers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta Maine.

Subscriber, Chanute, Kans.—It is proper to thank anyone for any courtesy extended, but when you go out with a young man to a celebration where there are all sorts of amusements, you don't have to thank him every time you eat ice cream or ride the merry-go-round. It is enough to laugh and enjoy everything and let him see you do, and then when it is all over tell him what a good time he has given you and how much you appreciate it. Formal thanks, that you give as if you were doing it out of a book, would spoil all the natural pleasure.

Country Girl, Keown, Pa.—The proper thing

Country Girl, Keown, Pa.—The proper thing to have done would have been for the young men to have asked the girls to join them in the game when they began. When the men went off to themselves to play, the girls had a right to do as they pleased.

do as they pleased.

Brown Eyes, Herndon, Va.—If the sixteenyear-old girl is out of school and her parents do not object she can "have company once a week." He should leave at ten o'clock unless the case is very serious. Letters once in two weeks can't do much harm. (2) First cousins can't be sweethearts, for in most states they can't marry. (3) The young man may escort the girl when she goes shopping if she wants him around when she is making her purchases.
Greenhorn, Columbus, O.—The minister usually offers his congratulations first to the newly wedded pair, then the parents or nearest relatives and so on. We believe ordinarily the groom need not send a written invitation to his parents, though it would not be bad form to do so.

Brown Eyes, Waldoboro, Me.—There is no especial significance in a man squeezing a girl's hand. (2) Of age varies in the states, but as a rule a girl is not of age until she is twenty-one. (3) Nine to half past is not too late to ask the young man to come in who has taken you driving.

Subscriber, Topeka, Kans.—You may ask your beau to take you to places you want to go, but don't impose upon him. Let him do most of the asking. It is all right to tell him why, when you don't go to some place because you have no one to take you. It is quite proper to ask the caller to sit out on the lawn instead of in the house of pleasant evenings. They can sit out as late as ten, or later, if the people in the house are still up. It is not obligatory, but it is better for parents to meet their daughters' visitors. Just a brief talk is sufficient. The caller who doesn't like to see the girl's parents is not the right kind. Go with him to the front steps, and as far as the gate if you like him real well, and it is not late.

Nellie, Anaconda, Va.—Your letter ows that you are in greater need of knowledge of school-books than of beaus. Study awhile and ask us Honey-dew and Sweetest, Agra, Okla.—He is flirting with both of you, and you should organize a combine, or Heart Trust, and put him out of business.

P. W. B.. Winona, Miss.—Probably the one going away should write first, as the one at home is not supposed to know the exact date of arrival, what the proper address is and other particulars. As a rule the man should always write the first letter, but rules have exceptions.

Subscriber Allentary Pa - Very fether is Subscriber, Allentown, Pa.—Your father is right enough in saying that if you are to study music you must give up the beaus. Still he might make a concession to the favored one. If he will not, then the favored one will prove that he is the right sort by waiting for you if you want him to wait. If he is selfish enough to want you to lose your music and the advantages that it promises, we think you will do well to let the other girls have him.

Hazel Eyes, Parsonshurg, Md—"Mesere"

Hazel Eyes, Parsonsburg, A should not be prefixed to the name Md.—"Messrs." Ignoramus, Hollywood, Ky.—A present other than flowers at commencement time from a young man to a sweet girl graduate is inappropriate. Certainly you ought to know what to say to her in the accompanying note. What do you think she would think of you if she knew you were asking somebody else what to say to her at such a tender moment? And you a Kentuckian!

Long Leg, Milwaukee, Wis.—Inasmuch as a kiss passed between you and the young man it makes no difference which did the kissing. Rules of etiquette don't apply. To kiss him on the cheek was quite proper. But don't do it any more till you are really and truly engaged. Men are mighty unreliable about some things.

Irene. Noble, Ill.—You will outgrow your blushing, but don't quite ever forget how. A blush is very pretty and is always a good sign. Don't let your sister's beau kiss you. One in the family ought to be enough for him.

A. D., Charleston, Wash.—Fifteen is five years too young to be engaged. Obey your parents and wait. If the young man really wants you he will wait for you.

Address COMFORT, Box 716, Augusta Maine. Three Stars Locust, Decorah, Ia.—The man as may say he is pleased to meet the lady when he is introduced, but it is better to say something else which may be suggested by the circumstances. Rules of what to say are hard to follow, and usually are stiff and of no meaning.

(2) If the lady does not object the man may take her arm.

Sewing Circle, Dennis, W. Va.—Don't have anything at all to do with a man like that. He's flirting with you, and lying besides. (2) Kisses signed in a letter are not as dangerous as those delivered in person. (3) Yes, the man ought to start right with the girl he goes with. Snub him if he does not.

Sunshine, Eaton, III.—If you and your beau are leaving your house about lunch time it is proper to eat before starting, unless he invites you to take lunch with him. Use your own taste about what to serve, and have it simple. (2) You may ask the young man to go walking on Sunday afternoon when he calls.

on sunday afternoon when he calls.

Sweet Sixteen, Brunswick, Neb.—Keep your engagement with the man you first made it with, unless there is good reason for breaking it.

Ethel Haines, New Creek, W. Va., asks that "Orphan Girl," who inquired in this column for a silk patchwork quilt write to her as she has one.

Blue Eyes, Mt. Carmel, Ill.—We don't answer any more questions about postage stamp significance on letters. There is only one place to put a stamp and one way, and that is, in the right hand upper corner of the envelope, right side up.

L. W., Carrothers, O.—We are not an authority on the various cosmetics you mention. Generally speaking the cosmetics offered for sale, while they may not do all that is claimed for them, are at least not prepared to do harm if properly used.

Emerald, Westville, Fla.—It is quite proper when you are walking and meet a man you know to stop and talk with him, if you want to.

(2) If you are engaged to the young man you may go to see him when he is sick. Otherwise it is enough to merely inquire about him, or send him something to cheer him.

it is enough to merely inquire about him, or send him something to cheer him.

O'eander, Caryville, Fla.—Don't let him stay later than 10.30. (2) You may accept small gifts, candy, flowers, books, from men to whom you are not engaged. (3) If the slight were very pronounced you may resent it by being very formal with the man hereafter. But don't make too much show of your feeling.

Gray-eyed Rose, Dalton, Mo.—It is not only improper, but dangerous, for a girl to write to an unknown man whose name she has found in a newspaper. How do you know that he isn't a convict, or a married man? (2) It is very polite of your escort to tell you when your dress has come unfastened. Why shouldn't he do so? Isn't it much better than to let most young men haven't gumption enough to correct an accident of that kind. (3) The lady speaks first, unless they are well known to each other, and friends, then it makes no difference who speaks first. The object of the rule is to protect the lady against men she doesn't wish to recognize.

to me now, and I shall take care of the life you have nearly destroyed in your inordinate ambition. Come, the fresh air will revive you."

They stood a moment under the honeysuckle arch over the parsonage gate, where the carriage was waiting to take them to Le Bocage, and Mr. Murray asked:

"Are you strong enough to go to the church?"

"Yes, sir; the pain has all passed away. I am perfectly well again."

They crossed the street, and he took her in his arms and carried her up the steps, and into the grand, solemn church, where the soft, holy, violet light from the richly-tinted glass streamed over gilded organ-pipes and sculptured columns. Neither Edna nor St. Elmo spoke as they walked down the aisle; and in perfect silence both knelt before the shining altar, and only God heard their prayers of gratitude.

After some moments Mr. Murray put out his hand, took Edna's, and holding it in his on the balustrade, he prayed aloud, asking God's blessing on their marriage, and fervently dedicating all their future to His work.

The hectic flush c' the dying day was reflected on the window high above the altar, and, burning through the red mantle of the Christ, fell down upon the marble shrine like sacred, sacrificial fire.

Edna felt as if her heart could not hold all its measureless joy. It seemed a delightful dream to see Mr. Murray kneeling at her side; to hear his voice earnestly consecrating their lives to the service of Jesus Christ.

She knew from the tremor in his tone, and the tears in his eyes, that his dedication was complete; and now to be his companion through all the remaining years of their earthly pilgrimage, to be allowed to help him and love him, to walk heavenward with her hand in his; this—this was the crowning glory and richest blessing of her life.

When this prayer ended, she laid her head down on the altar-railing, and sobbed like a child.

In the orange glow of a wintry sunset they came out and sat down on the steps, while a pair of spotless white pigeons perched on the blood-stain; and Mr. Murray put his arm around Edna, and drew her face to his bosom.

"Darling, do you remember that once, in the dark days of my reckless sinfulness, I asked you one night, in the library at Le Bocage, if you had no faith in me? And you repeated so vehemently, 'None, Mr. Murray!'

"Oh, sir! do not think of it. Why recur to what is so painful and so long past? Forgiv those words and forget them! Never was more implicit faith, more devoted affection, given to any human being than I give now to you, Mr. Murray; you, who are my first and my last and my only love."

She felt his arm tighten around her waist, as he bowed his face to hers.

"Forgive? Ah, my darling! do you recontect also that I told you then that the time would come when your dear lips would ask pardon for what they uttered that night, and that when that hour arrived I would take my revenge? My wife! my pure, noble, beautiful wife! give/mm my revenge, for I cry with the long-banished Roman:

'Oh! a kiss—long as my exile,
Sweet as my revenge!'"

'Oh! a kiss—long as my exile, Sweet as my revenge!"

'Oh! a kiss—long as my exile,
Sweet as my revenge!''

He put his hand under her chin, drew the lips to his, and kissed them repeatedly.

Down among the graves, in the brown grass and withered leaves, behind a tall shaft, around which coiled a carved marble serpent with hooded head—there, amid the dead, crouched a woman's figure, with a stony face, and eyes that glared with murderous hate at the sweet countenance of the happy bride. When St. Elmo tenderly kissed the pure lips of his wife, Agnes Powell smothered a savage cry, and Nemesis was satisfied as a wretched woman fell forward on the grass, sweeping her yellow hair over her eyes, to shut out the vision that maddened her.

Then and there, for the first time, as she sat enfolded by her husband's arm, Edna felt that she could thank him for the monument erected over her grandfather's grave.

The light faded slowly in the west, the pigeons ceased their fluttering about the belfry, and as he turned to quit the church, so dear to both, Mr. Murray stretched his hand toward the ivy-clad vault, and said solemnly:

"I throw all mournful years behind me; and, by the grace of God, our new lives, commencing this hallowed day, shall make noble amends for the wasted past. Loving each other, aiding each other, serving Christ, through whose atonement alone I have been saved from eternal ruin. To Thy merciful guidance, O Father! we commencent had long since passed; and, as his splendid eyes came back to hers, reading in her beautiful, pure face all her love and confidence and happy hope, he drew her closer to his bosom, and laid his dark cheek on hers, saying fondly and proudly:

"My wife, my life. Oh! we will walk this world. Yoked in all exercise of noble end,

"My wife, my life. Oh! we will walk this world. Yoked in all exercise of noble end, And so through those dark gates across the wild That no man knows. My hopes and thine are one Accomplish thou my manhood, and thyself, Lay thy sweet hands in mine and trust to me."

M. G. B., Edgerton, Wis.—All of Colorado is high and dry, altitude varying from three thousand to fifteen thousand feet, about, and any part of it is good for catarrh. Denver is about 5,200 feet up and the air is high and dry there, but it is a large city and city air is never so good as country air. But Denver would be a vast improvement over your present location if you have much catarrh where you are.

Thorough cure.

M. K., Hayward, Wis.—Before making any effort to find a hospital where you may learn to become a trained nurse, have a talk with a physician as to the duties and demands of such a position and get his advice on your natural qualifications. It is most difficult work and requires especial natural abilities in more than one direction. If you have no physician near you, write to one you know. A great many young women think they would like to be trained nurses, but only the fewest number are fitted for it. There are many trained nurses who ought to be doing something else.

W. T. and M. T., Opelika, Ala.—Yours are not cases to be treated through the mails, or in any way except by the close attention of a physician. If your physicians can not help you, we certainly cannot.

W. J. M., Lancaster, S. C.—Better consult a barber. We know of no whisker grower that is reliable. We can say, however, that if the scar is a very large one you will hardly be able to grow whiskers sufficient to cover it, and the hair will never grow out of the scar it. Barbers are the best authorities on whiskers.

Mother, Frostburg, Md.—Have you consulted a physician about the case of the little girl? If not do so. It is a simple weakness that she will outgrow, but just at present your care is required and you must follow the instructions of a physician. (2) Use lunar caustic on the warts. You can get a stick at any drugstore. Ask the druggist how to use it, and be sure not to get it on the skin about the wart. A few applications will remove them, if they are of the ordinary type.

P. E. F., Clarksburg, W. Va.—Much depends upon what causes the cough. When a cough persists for four months it is something more than a "cold," and if your physicians cannot cure it, you should at once seek a different climate. The best climatic conditions are to be found in the cold dry air of Colorado, or the hot dry air of Arizona and New Mexico.

J. C. W., La Junta, Col.—We know nothing of your habits or what might cause the red veins in your skin. Mrs. F. H. H., South Bend, Ind.—In view of the fact that the doctors, the sanitarium and the rheumatism medicine all seem to be unable to relieve you we suggest that you try Christian Science treatment. That may sound irregular and not orthodox, and the doctors and some others may laugh, but Christian Science has effected some remarkable cures and it may be just what you need. We are inclined to believe that it will do you good. At the same time we are not professors of that faith, and do not believe in all of its teachings. Part of your trouble is a species of hysteria—nerves, you know—and C. S. works admirably in many nervous troubles with women. At least, give it a trial. If you have no C. S. people in your town, try the osteopaths, who also effect cures where regular physicians fail. We belong to no school and believe most in that which does the most good to the patient.

J. L. C., Winamac, Ind.—It is pretty hard to the patient.

J. L. C., Winamac, Ind.—It is pretty hard to guess, from this distance, what alls the baby, but our guess is that he is getting too much medicine. His stomach undoubtedly does not act as it should, but we do not believe the medicine is helping him much. Suppose you stop the medicine and give him injections of warm water to move his bowels. You will have to do this under a physician's direction. Possibly you have already tried it. As he grows older and stronger, he will undoubtedly improve in condition, but you will always have to watch his diet.

Nulsance, Parsonsburg, Md.—The "growling" you complain of is due to gases in the stomach and it is difficult to correct it. It is caused by poor digestion, and may be relieved somewhat by careful dieting. About as good a remedy as we know of is to take before each meal, a half-teaspoonful of cooking soda m two thirds of a glass of hot water, though cold will answer. This also, in smaller quantity, may be taken when the growing begins. It is an alkali which will instantly-neutralize the acid in the stomach. Half a teaspoonful of essence of peppermint in wineglass of water may also be taken at times to drive off the gas. These are harmless remedies and you may take them whenever you feel like it. Have you ever consulted a physician about it? A too tight corset impairs the indigestion and aggravates the trouble.

H. D., Gridley, Kans.—Stop taking medicine to build up your system and get your mind off of yourself. There is nothing the matter with you that a little exercise of will won't cure.

or cise of will won't cure.

L. R., Webster, S. D.—The massage cup is not in our line. Doesn't it have directions how to use? We suppose massage cream should be used with it as in the other forms of massage. You must not expect too much from such applications. Sometimes they work wonders, but not always.

Sapphire, Atlanta, Ga.—Stuttering, or stammering, is a nervous disease and it is difficult of effect a radical cure, as it will almost invariably return in moments of excitement, or when weakened from illness, or other causes. Many remedies, in fact almost as many as there are stutterers, have been tried, and about the only sure rule is to work out your own cure on lines of autosuggestion, so to say. The schools for stammerers frequently produce excellent results, and we advise that you attend one if you are able to do so. They may not tell you anything new, but they will compel you to talk as you will not force yourself to do, without assistance. Carelessness has much to do with it.

Carelessness has much to do with it.

Want-to-know, Scott City, Kans.—The hypnotist has no power over a will which opposes his own. Opposition kills hypnotism as far as the opposer is concerned. If the man at a distance hypnotizes you and gives you headaches it is because you are weak enough to yield to the influence. If you will not make the proper effort to resist you may expect to be influenced until you do.

L. L. Ralimora, Md.—Stricker's cott discrete

Mrs. L. E., Piedmont, S. C.—Golter is practically incurable and can only be properly treated by a physician in attendance. Possibly some reader of Comport may give a recipe which is of household use, and will afford some relief.

reader of Comfort may give a recipe which is of household use, and will afford some relief.

L. S., Fredericktown, O.—The eyes are too delicate to be treated by our facilities. You should see an oculist if possible. If not able to pay one, you might go to your nearest city and apply at one of the free hospitals where the treatment of the eyes is very often under direction of the most skilled experts. Can any Comfort reader who knows of blind persons doing work that earns them money give any information to this patient?

S. Y., Ashburn, Mo.—In our opinion you are suffering from indigestion which has become chronic. If you will at once make an entire change of diet, eating only the simplest food, eggs, rice, brown bread, lean meat and not much of it, no potatoes, and only such other vegetables as digest very easily, no pastry, drink no coffee, and plenty of water between meals, none at meals, and before each meal take half a teaspoonful of cooking soda in glass of hot water, you will soon begin to experience relief. There may be some trouble which does not appear from the symptoms you give, but from all we know you are suffering chiefly from bad digestion. Read up on physical culture and take the exercise it prescribes, including deep breathing every morning when you get up, standing before an open window.

L. L., Lone Tree, Iowa.—Don't sleep on your arm and you will not shut off the circulation and gave it that dead feeling. Change your diet. Quit pork and potatoes, try eggs, beef, rice, other vegetables and milk, taken only in small mouthfuls and never by the gulp. Always stopeating before your appetite is quite satisfied. This sort of diet will improve your digestion and you will not feel so sleepy after meals. There is really nothing the matter with you and proper food will put you all right. Your regular diet of potatoes, pork, bread and water would kill a horse.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

Mrs. E. S.—We do not think that you have a very good case against the parties who sold you the land, we think your acceptance of the deed would operate as a waiver of any verbal misrepresentation they may have made you, in the manner you describe, and that your inability to produce any testimony of disinterested witnesses would also be very much to your disadvantage.

Mrs. E. V. McC.—Under the laws of the State from which you write, we are of the opinion that an illegitimate child has no right of inheritance from its father's estate, except in cases where its parents have intermarried after its birth and the father has acknowledged the child, in which event the child is legitimatized. It would have no interest in the life insurance unless it was mentioned by name as a beneficiary in the policy.

Mrs. F. W.—We are of the opinion that, under the laws of the State from which you write, unless cut off by will, the husband of your aunt would receive the whole of the personal property your aunt's estate is entitled to receive from the estate of your uncle; perhaps the whole of the personal estate may be used up as expenses of administration, in which event there would be nothing for him to receive. him to receive.

ministration, in which event there would be nothing for him to receive.

Mrs. A. B. Catich.—Under the laws of the State from which you write, we are of the opinion, (1) that your marriage was a legal and valid one; (2) that upon your husband's death having no will you would receive one half of both his personal and real estate and the other half would go to your children in equal shares; (3) that a general guardian of your children would be appointed upon proper application to the Court, and that you would be the natural person to be appointed, unless it was proved to the Court's satisfaction that you were an improper person to receive such an appointment; but in case any attempt was made to do this you would be entitled to receive full notice and you would have an opportunity to protect your interest before the Court. (4) We do not think that under the laws of your State you can, without the written consent of your husband, dispose of by your will more than one half of your property, and the other half would go to your children in equal shares without a will.

Mrs. M. J. W.—We do not think that you, or whoever shares without a will.

Mrs. M. J. W.—We do not think that you, or whoever is the legal representative of your husband's estate, can dispose of a greater interest in the patent you mention than he owned at the time of his death, and that the other persons interested in the patent must be taken in consideration in making a sale of the patent right. We think you would be wise to make some move to either sell or use in some way the patent right you mention, as otherwise it will expire before it will be of any value to you. (2) We do not think you can establish a claim for damage against the Government on the state of facts you submit to us.

not be entitled to any share of the estate.

Mrs. B. A. S.—We are of the opinion that, if a deed to the land you mention was accepted by the purchaser without objection and the description in the deed of conveyance described the property giving distances and describing meets and bounds, both parties would be bound by the deed, unless the discrepancy was so great and the circumstances pointed to a fraud being committed in which event the sale might be set aside. (2) We think you could convey your farm, reserving in the deed such right or rights as you and the purchaser may agree upon provided, of course, such reservation is properly set up in the deed. In the event of such a sale you should pay taxes upon such a proportion of the property as the part you reserve bears to the entire property.

their vicinity.

Mrs. S. S.—Under the laws of the State you mention, we are of the opinion, that, if your husband at the time of his death left no will, you would be entitled to dower in his real estate consisting of the income of one third of the real estate for the time of your natural life. If you took a lump sum in lieu of dower, such amount should be fixed by a series of computation taken from the Life Insurance tables giving the probable length of time you will still live, and then figure what one third of the income of the property would be worth for the estimated number of years you have still to live; such computation could be made by the Court in case you desire to make such an arrangement.

The letters were produced and settled for, and Jerry thrust those belonging to Joseph Parkhurst into his breast pocket. Then he gazed keenly at the epistle directed to himself.

It was post-marked New York, and had been sent from the city nearly ten days before. Tearing it open, he read as follows:

"MASTER JEREMIAH BLUE,

"My Dear Young Friend: You will perhaps be surprised to hear from me so speedily, but the fact of the matter is, I feel under heavy obligations to you for the service done me, and I have lost no time in taking up the matter of your parentage, with a view to solving the mystery, if possible."

The Shadow of a Cross

A Religious Quarrel and Separation

"You alarm yourself needlessly, Warfield. I was in there not half an hour ago and he seemed as usual. I have promised—I mean I am going out—I cannot stay at home this evening." She spoke with averted face, remembering her promised rendezvous with Corcoran.

Recognizing the futility of further pleading he turned away heart sick and entered the nursery. For hours, he knew not how long, the child lay in a lethargy, its breathing so faint at times he had to incline his ear to be assured its soul had not really passed. After a long time it stirred and faintly spoke the only word to which those baby lips had ever given utterance:

"Mamma."

"No darling." said Gene softly, "it isn't mamma. You couldn't, I suppose, say 'dadda' just once, could you?"

In the blue cyes upraised there was a ray of intelligence and a tiny hand reached out and touched his face.

"Dadda", the little creature murmured.

A look of delight stole into the father's eyes and he cried breathlessly: "
"Say it again, precious."

"Say it again, precious."

"Say it again, precious."

"Say at hispered the child. Then suddenly a change came. The little face quivered, darkened, and there was no more suffering—the baby was dead. So swift, so silent had been the passing at first Gene scarcely realized it, then the truth broke on him and with a heartrending sigh he fung himself on his knees beside the little bed.

Dawn was breaking when Victoria stepped out of the elevator and walked down the landing. There was no song on her lips and she did not carelessly pass the nursery as was her wont. Something in the intense stillness of the room impelled her and she softly pushed open the door. As she caught sight of the group, Gene's kneeling figure and the tiny white face on the pillow beyond, the feelings she had stilled so long trembled into being. She had thought of the child only as a restraint upon her liberty, but now as she gazed upon the little one that would never trouble her more those hidden chords which lay beneath all the worl

Four weeks later Warfield was seated in his study writing. In carelessly pushing aside some papers he upset the ink bottle. The great crises in human lives depend more upon the little things than we quite realize. Even the fate of nations may be changed by a five minutes delay.

"Here is a mess," thought Warfield, "and no blotting paper. Perhaps there is some in Victoria's room. I will ask her."

She was not in the room when he entered and without thought of anything but the article he was in search of, he opened the drawer of her desk. A crumpled paper lay there as though she had been interrupted in its perusal and had hastily tucked it away.

As Warfield took it up almost before he was aware of what he was doing he read the words written there. It ran thus:

written there. It is an example with the company of the comfort of your presence.

"Ever yours, Corcoran."

"Ever yours, CORCORAN."

For long minutes Gene stood stricken into dumb silence as the words which convinced him of his wife's guilt burned themselves into his brain, then hearing a gasp ne turned and encountered the startled gaze of Victoria. All the roses had gone out of her cheeks and she looked suddenly old.

"It is true, then—all that this letter discloses," Gene finally said.

"Yes, it is true."

"You love this man?"

"Yes," she said, and the shame in her face was terrible to witness, "I love him. I don't attempt to explain it. I have loved him since the first hour we met. He dominates me body and soul—for him I sacrificed your tender love, I made our life a hell. I destroyed our child—it was my cruelty that killed it,—all for the love of this man. Why do you stand there so silently? Speak—condemn, despise me—say that you loathe me—no amount of reproaches you can heap upon me can hurt half so much as my conscience has tortured me during these past weeks." She ceased and stood a statue of hard despair, asking no mercy.

"Victoria," Gene began slowly, and she listened

"You were always my superior, Gene. I think it was for that I was turned against you—no matter how hard I tried I could never drag you down to my level. I hated you for your superiority then, but I respect you for it now." Gene took within his clasp her little hand that bore his wedding ring, pressed it gently, removed the ring, then released it.

"You are free—my only wish is that you may be happy." Then he left her and went out into the night.

What COMFORT Offers You!

Two new stories begin in this issue and we propose to publish during the coming fall and winter months the most interesting and entertaining issues of COMFORT we have yet brought off our presses.

Having installed a new triple web perfecting color press of the latest design, We now have mechanical facilities to do a very high grade of printing, so that COMFORT will be preseted to you with a clean, attractive appearance at the outset, not to mention the contents, the programme for which has been in the making for many months.

We are anxious to begin this early Autumn subscription campaign in order that we may obtain the greatest possible rumber of new subscriptions, also renewal orders, before January 1st, 1983. We start right in by giving you a bigger and better COMFORT instead of promising improvements, and a partial list of what is now commenced in this issue, or is to appear next month and in October, must be interesting reading for you and convince you of the superiority of COMFORT as the favorite and ideal home monthly magazine, now entering its twentieth year of usefulness.

Two New Stories this Month

From "St. Elmo" to "A Speckled Bird" is a continuation of the feast. The very popular success of "St. Elmo" convinces us that "A Speckled Bird," by the same author, Mrs. Augusta J. Evans, will become its rival among all our readers, and it is a source of pleasure to us to be enabled to offer this great serial, which will appear in generous YEARLY subscribers, take notice monthly installments during the coming season. The opening chapters appear now, and we invite your attention to it, knowing you will be at once interested.

Only a Girl; or, From Rags to Riches," By FRED THORFE, a delightful girls' story, opens with vim and vigor characteristic of the entire story, which is bound to absorb the reader from beginning to end. We have been indeed fortunate to obtain the privilege to publish such a splendid story, which appeals as readily to the older as well as to the younger generation. It is good for anyone to read such a story as "ONLY A GIRL."

Mary J. Holmes and Oliver Optic stories are in hand and the first installments will appear in early numbers of COMFORT. Our Mary J. Holmes' story will be one of the very best features of our magazine for the whole winter. No writer of popular fiction has produced in quantity, the valuable fiction stories written by MRS. HOLMES, who at an advanced age still enjoys the enormous royalties from her numberless copyright stories, which a generous and admiring public are always eager to read. This is one of her favorite stories and is destined to become immediately popular with our readers. Do not fail to be ready for the first installment.

'Charlie's Fortune," a very strong Optic story, commences soon, and while it is a young folks' story, it will entertain persons at any age. OLIVER OPTIC STORIES are not to be had in any and every publication; heretofore a prohibitive copyright royalty has kept these stories in the "book form" class and made it impossible to obtain serial privilege. OLIVER OPTIC, as the premier author of young folks' stories, needs no introduction to COM-FORT readers; the name and story title warrants the quality, and you have but to read to be entertained. These are only a few of the many new stories COMFORT will give you during the coming year.

"JERRY, THE BACKWOODS BOY," and "THE SHADOW OF A CROSS," continue to appear in regular installments. In each instance there are some of the best features of the stories yet to appear and the closing chapters become all absorbing. A larger number of SHORT STORIES will be printed through the year, and our editors are now making selections from a great many treating on interesting subjects.

The Pretty Girls' Club

is a NEW FEATURE presented this month, and our thousands of feminine readers will derive mental as well as physical benefit from our Beauty Column to oe conducted on the most approved scientific lines by KATHERINE BOOTH, an authority on how to be pretty, as well as skin, scalp and facial defects in general. The article is to be interestingly conducted to suit all girls from eight to eighty and must be of important value to all.

Uncle Charlie, Boys' Corner, etc. In addition to above programme COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, IN AND AROUND

THE HOME, SISTERS' CORNER, COUSIN MARION, ET!QUETTE EDITOR, HOME LAW YER, MUSIC, MANNERS AND LOOKS, FAMILY DOCTOR and the BOYS' CORNER, conducted by Uncle John, are each continued, and best of all, COMFORT'S big agency and premium reward plan is always available. The biggest and best premiums for the least number of subscriptions to the most popular home monthly published.

16 Months' Subscription 15 Cents

In order that you may continue reading our new stories and to induce new subscription for the coming season, to extend the field of COMFORT and further familiarize it among new families, we offer below an extra special subscription privilege, in addition to placing before you an unusual array of all new popular and practical premium gift articles which are free for small clubs of subscribers at our 15-cent rate and in order to have our expirations occur at the year end, we shall send COMFORT until December, 1908. In connection with club agency work we furnish catalogues, etc., free upon application.

Word About Expiring Subscriptions

You will not want your subscription to cease now that we have begun all of these new stories and are to commence so many others right away; so if the number on the wrapper in which you receive this copy of COMFORT is 226 or less, you should renew at once, sending 15 cents for subscription to December, 1908, otherwise you will be without COMFORT. So if you accept now and renew you get 16 months' subscription for 15 cents.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time. Simply because they cannot. This watch keeps not perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you get a club of 9 subscribers to this paper, at our special subscription price of 15 cents a year each. Do this, sending us $1.35, with the names of 9 subscribers to this paper, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send you the watch to reward you for your efforts in our behalf. Start out now and see what you can do. Remember we guarantee every watch. If you get 11 subscribers and send us NOW $1.65 for the same, we will also send you a nice chain. OUR BOYS' PRINTING OUTFIT. Make Money Printing Cards.

About all boys have an ambition to learn a trade that will give honest employment and mental improvement. With our handy Printing Outfift a boy or girl can accomplish the art of type setting as well as printing, thus conquering two subjects at one time. These complete outfits consist of a six-font set of rubber type; that is, there are six of each of most all the letters in the alphabet except some important letters have eight, and others only four, such as all four handsome ornaments; also slugs or spaces of separate words—in all about 200 separate pieces of type. A two-line type holder for printing press, so you can print cards for your friends and thus make money. A pair of nickeled pincers to handle type and a metal case ink pad. This ink pad is everlasting and can be renewed if constant use removes the ink. With each set we send a wooden type case so that type can be arranged and kept in perfect order, also full and complete instructions how to set type, etc. A wonderful outfit for printing cards or small amount of text. Will afford amusement and instruction unbounded. Every child will appreciate one and grown folks can make use of these sets for marking linen by procuring an indelible ink pad. It is probable such an outfit as we offer can not be found everywhere and we expect to give away a great many for the slight work done in getting subscriptions for us.

CLUB OFFER For a club of only 3 yearly subscribers at 15 cents each, 45 cents in all, we will send you postpaid one of these Printing Outfits all complete as described.

The works of the popular authors above mentioned, also a large number of other popular authors' best efforts, are included in our new list of gift books. From an assortment of over 400 titles we have selected the most popular and desirable works of these famous American and European Authors.

Each book is printed on good quality paper, from large. Clear type, is 7½ inches long, 5 wide and vary in thickness, all one inch or more, and weigh about one pound each. Cloth Bindings are genuine Linen Cloth of several attractive and striking colors, especially made for this series. Each cover has an ornamental design, as shown in the Illustration, and the titles are all done in genuine gold and two-colored inks. Each cover design is by some well-known artist, and the high quality of this alone makes the outer appearance of each book at once attractive, as it gives the book a rich appearance for shelving or when lying on the table. Taken all in all this series of books is an excelent edition and we are pleased to have the opportunity to place them before you at this particular season of the year and at such liberal terms.

The Most Lovable Sort of Girl

BY A. W. KOENIG.

ERTAINLY she is not the blue-stocking crammed with information in an undigested-form, neglectful of her person, sallow of skin, contemptuous person, sallow of skin, contemptuous of those graces which are to womanhood what the scent is to the lily or the color to the rose.

If you could induce her to forget how clever she was, or lose sight of it yourself for half a minute, she might be lovable; upon excitement.

Not the beauty, because handsome is as handsome does, and the prettiest girls are often the shallowest and the vainest.

Not the Martha-like maiden, harassed—about household affairs, whose burning ambition is to live in a large house, and who re-her cleverness—at least the so-called clever woman of today, who is really the most stupid woman of all time.

Not the society girl, always in a whirl, the devotee of balls and private theatricals, thirsting for publicity, rushing wildly from one thing to another, depending for happiness upon excitement.

gards a husband more or less as an adjunct to it.

gards a husband more or less as an adjunct to it.

Not the exacting girl, quick and passionate of temper, jealous of every other woman, suspicious to an insane degree, always fancying some neglect and resenting it.

Not the sharp-tongued girl, with the quick repartee and the witty sarcasm.

Not the smart girl, with her frequent changes of costume, her inordinate extravagance and her devotion to fashion.

The most lovable type of girl is the oldfashioned. The girl who thinks in many things as her great-grandmothers did before her;

the girl who is glad of a man's protection, his arm across a street, his help over a stile, his assistance in carrying parcels, his escort to the theater—the girl who could stand alone, if she had to do it, but who greatly prefers to be spared the necessity.

The girl who can spend a month at home and stay in every night without once being dull or bored.

The girl who can darn socks, fix buttons and at a pinch, adjust a patch.

The girl who can see good in everything, who has a large heart and a kindly, amiable nature. the girl who is glad of a man's protection,

MOONLIGHT AND MUSIC

The Strining Orb of the Night and Meledious Strains from Sweet Oreheetras Make Summer a Continuous Dream of Joy and Pleasure.

Are you not thrilled with music, sweet ender music, on a beautiful moonlight

Are you not thrilled with music, sweet tender music, on a beautiful moonlight night?

Nothing in this world so arouses the poetic fancies of men and women and nothall makes them so joyful as a combination of moonlight and music.

I want to tell you here how you may have the sweetest, the most tender music and ringing ragtime as well on every moonlight night this summer right on your own lawn or your own porch and it will cost you almost nothing compared with the pleasure that will be yours.

Joy for the Night

I know of no better way to spend the glorious evenings of summer than by listening to the wonderful music of a genuine Edison new style 1907 model phonograph, and for this reason I am glad to be able to place on this page full details of the great FREE TRIAL and easy-payment offer which is being made to every reader of this paper by the Edison Phonograph distributors of Chicago.

The editor of this paper is impressed by the fact that the new style 1907 model Edison phonograph is a truly wonderful machine. It does such a great variety of marvelous things—things almost beyond belief. The new style 1907 Edison phonograph is so far superior to the old style scratching imitations that you cannot imagine how sweet is the music from this marvelous new instrument. Don't form your opinion of the new style Edison by the scratchy, rasping machines you may have heard at public entertainments.

Whole Summer of Pleasure

Think of the joy that will be yours during the entire summer if you get an Edison phonograph now on the easy-payment, freetrial offer made on this page. I want you to read all about this marvelous offer because I want you to have at your command the means of the greatest entertainment you can imagine. Every afternoon, every evening, every Sunday you may have in your own house, on the porch or on the lawn, the sweet toned Edison playing the finest opera selections, the greatest band and orchestra pieces, the best vocal music, amusing recitations and comic songs. The Edison gives you anything you like. You may have a band concert any time you wish and any time you desire. Think of what this means. Your home and your lawn will then be as popular as are the parks of the great cities on the nights when the band concerts take place.

Suppose you want an evening concert to please the widest kind of taste. You get up something like this:

Crumbs of Comfort

Minds of moderate caliber ordinarily condemn everything which is beyond their range.

What you keep by you you may change and mend, but words once spoken can never be re-

Nothing in the world is more haughty than a man of moderate capacity when once raised

There never was law or sect or opinion that did so magnify goodness as the Christian religion does.

Thought is deeper than all speech;
Feeling deeper than all thought;
Souls to souls can never teach
What unto themselves was taught.
—C. P. Cre

Strike from mankind the principle of faith, and men would have no more history than a flock of sheep.

The person who thinks there can be any real conflict between science and religion must be very ignorant in religion.

The discovery of what is true and the practice of what is good are the two most impor-tant objects of philosophy.

A countryman is as warm in jeans as a king in velvet, and the truth is as comfortable in homely language as in fine speech.

The reason that so many want their desires is that their desires want reason. He may do what he will, who will do what he may.

what he will, who will do what the kill water faileth; Idleness ever despaireth, bewaileth; Keep the watch wound, for the dark rust assaileth; Flowers droop and die in the stillness of noon.

— Osgood.

If you do not wish a man to do a thing you had better get him to talk about it, for the more men talk the more likely they are to do nothing else.

No man's abilities are so shining as not to need a proper opportunity, a patron, and even the praises of a friend to recommend them to the notice of the world.

The instruction received at the mother's knee and the paternal lessons together with the pious and sweet souvenirs of the fireside are never effaced entirely from the soul.

Inward religion without the outward show of it is like a tree without fruit, useless; and the outward show of religion without sincerity is like a tree without heart, lifeless.

We live in deeds, not years;
In thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart-throbs.
He most lives who thinks most,
Feels the noblest, acts the best.

P. J. Bailey The question is not whether a doctrine is beautiful, but whether it is true. When we wish to go to a place we do not sak whether the road leads through a pretty country, but whether it is the right road.

If ever I reach heaven I expect to find three wonders there: First, to meet some I had not thought to see there; second, to miss some I had expected to see there, and third and greatest wonder of all; to find myself there.—John Newton.

zine, note time's flight even more than you do. No sooner is one issue off our hands, than we are industriously preparing another. The breathing spell never seems to come. It's busy, busy, busy, sall the year round. However, it is no use grieving over the rapidity of time's flight, and the days that are gone. You will remember the old saying: "The mill will never grind with water that is passed."

There is still a little of the year left, in which we can accomplish many good deeds, if we put our minds to the task. The year need not be a failure if we put our shoulders to the wheel, and work earnestly and hard for the remaining four months. The battle is never lost until it is won, so do not be discouraged if 1907 has so far been a failure for you, but say: "I can, and I will," grit your teeth hard and limber up your muscles, and go to work with grim determination, and you will turn defeat into victory, failure into success.

We are trying to make a record for COMFORT this year, and with a little assistance from you we can make this our banner year. So many of you forget to renew your subscriptions, and we have to drop your names from our mailing list, as we positively do not send COMFORT after the time for which it is paid has expired. Directly your name is dropped from the mailing list and your paper stops coming, you rush to renew your subscription, but, alas, you have after the time for which it is paid has expired. Directly your name is dropped from the mailing list and your paper stops coming, you rush to renew your subscription, but, alas, you have delayed just long enough to lose a copy, which contained the most exciting part of the story you were so deeply interested in, and you frantically beg for the missing number, only to be disappointed, as we keep a very limited number of back issues, and these are filed for reference, only. All subscriptions commence with the current issue. How much trouble you would save us, dear friends, how much annoyance you would save yourselves, if you would renew your subscriptions a month or two before they expired. When you are subscribing, it is just as easy to send 25 cents as 15. You don't miss that other dime, and it pays for two years instead of one. Get the habit of renewing your subscriptions at least three months before they run out, and get the habit (a most sensible and economical one) of subscribing for two years. It is an immense saving of time and trouble to you and to us. The greatest mistake you can make in this year of greates it to let your subscription to COWENET. ing of time and trouble to you and to us. The greatest mistake you can make in this year of grace, is to let your subscription to COMFORT run out, for this magazine is going to be brighter and more interesting and entertaining than ever, and it will be a constant source of regret to you if you miss a single number. Renew your subscriptions today, and bring in a new member to the COMFORT family with you. Our success wholly depends upon your efforts in our behalf. You enjoy COMFORT, aye, most of you love COMFORT, and others will love to enjoy it too, if you'll only be kind and good enough to shew it to them, and tell them about it.

The greatest mistake anyone can make is to

The greatest mistake anyone can make, is to let his subscription to COMFORT lapse. As a first step to mending the mistakes of 1907, and making it your, as well as our record year, send in one year's subscription to COMFORT at once, two, if possible. It is the cheapest and best investment in the world.

President Roosevelt made a striking speech at the Jamestown Exposition recently. He advocated Federal ownership of all coal, forest, oil and ranch lands which remain in the government's possession. He called too upon Congress to frame a radical inheritance and income tax law. He also advocated a Federal Child Labor law, and a law making employers responsible for all accidents to their employees. The President also urged upon the country the necessity of keeping the navy at the highest pitch of efficiency, and by yearly additions to our fleet, making the navy capable of upholding the honor of our flag upon the high seas against the fleets of any nation. President Roosevelt said: "The mineral fuels of the Eastern United States have already passed into the hands of large private owners, and those in the West are rapidly following. This should not be, for such mineral resources belong in a peculiar degree to the whole people. Under private control there is much waste from short-sighted methods of working, and the complete utilization is often sacrificed for the greater immediate profit."

President Roosevelt pointed out that coal does not grow, while trees do. The coal supply then is definitely limited, and coal should be conserved, not wasted, and the control of coal lands should remain in the hands of the be conserved, not wasted, and the control of coal lands should remain in the hands of the government, to protect the people against injustice and extortionate prices as far as it is possible to do so. The government has done much in the regulation of the great oil fields of Indian Territory, and what it has done there Indian Territory, and what it has done there can be done elsewhere. The one great fundamental problem which our statesmen must solve, is the conservation of all our national resources, and as the President truly said, "Upon the wise solution of this much of our future obviously depends". He also went on to say: "Most civilized countries have an income and inheritance tax. In my judgment both should be a part of our system of Federal taxation." Speaking of the inheritance tax, the President said: "The inheritance tax would make the swollen fortunes in this country bear in proportion to their size a constant; in

HE Fall is once more here, and the best part of the year is gone. In a few weeks, we shall be preparing for Thanksgiving, and Thanksgiving tax is in no shape or way a tax on thrift and of the year. Everything moves quickly in the 20th century. Even Time seems to go faster than ever. The old gentleman possibly has discarded his wings and adopted electricity as a mode of locomotion.

Probably we, who make your favorite magazine, note time; flight even more than you do. ciers."

In closing his remarkable speech the President said: "Modern wars are decided long before they are fought. I earnestly hope we shall never have another war; but if we do, its result will have been determined in advance, for its outcome will mainly depend upon the preparations which have been made in times of peace."
Your editor has deemed it necessary that this remarkable speech should be brought to your notice, as the matters discussed therein are of notice, as the matters discussed therein are of immense importance to the people of this country. The government ownership of coal mines was a plank in the platform of the New York State Democrats in 1902. This idea which has been denounced as ultra Socialistic, now it is advocated by President Roosevelt, will be regarded probably as a sane, sensible, conservative measure. The people of this country are ceasing to be the staves of parties. The people want reforms and care not who make the laws, as long as those laws bring them the laws, as long as those laws bring them better and purer government, both state and municipal.

Electric railroads are making the steam roads sit up and take notice. Between Indianapolis and Muncie, a distance of fifty-four miles, five trains ran daily and the fare was $1.85. This was a few years ago. Today eighteen electric trains run between these two cities and the cost of transportation is only eighty-five cents. was a few years ago. Today eighteen electric trains run between these two cities and the cost of transportation is only eighty-five cents. Two trains only used to run between Kokomo and Indianapolis, today there are seventeen trains speeding between these two points. These inter-urban roads are solving the traffic and freight problem, and eventually they will enable the people to throw off the railroad yoke. The steam roads did their utmost to stop this competition, but the Indiana Legislature gave the right of Emminent Domain to the inter-city electric lines, a right hitherto only enjoyed by the steam roads, and in spite of lavish expenditures of money in bribing the representatives of the people; the steam roads were defeated, and the people's rights to acquire highways for electric traffic were sustained. It will be noted that the cost of transportation by trolly is only half that of the railroads, which is a saving the traveling public will appreciate greatly. The Indiana roads are also handling a great quantity of freight of a perishable kind. They now operate one thousand miles of track, and two thousand more miles will take merchandise for shipment up to the moment of the starting of the trains, while the railway companies accept no freight companies will take merchandise for shipment up to the moment of the starting of the trains, while the railway companies accept no freight for shipment after 4 P. M.

What has been done in Indiana can be done in other states, and is being done rapidly in many. If legislation fails to bring the railroads to their senses, we can rely in time upon the trolly lines, to make these over-capitalized concerns less arrogant in their demands on shipper cerns less arrogant in their demands on shipper and traveler.

Your friend, Comfort's Editor.

Fattening by Force

"Some of you chicken raisers," said the man chewing a straw, "may not know it, but there is over $900,000 invested in this country in fattening plants where chickens are made to get fat whether they want to or not. It has been done in Europe for a long time, but is only recently adopted here. There are 24 fattening plants in Illinois, Kansas, Iowa and Missouri, and each one has its machine for forcing the food down the chicken's throat. Four plants in Chicago fatten hundreds of thousands every year. The chickens are fed the natural way in Chicago fatten hundreds of thousands every year. The chickens are fed the natural way for a week, and then when they don't want to eat any more, they are taken to the machine and the food stuffed down them. After the first two or three operations they seem to like it, and they fatten very rapidly. They are fed only 28 times, twice a day, before they are fat enough to kill. Machine fattened poultry is said to be plumper and have a better flavor than the other kind. The money cost may be a little greater, but the saving is in the time."

A New House Heater 📑

"There is always something new," remarked a dapper little man, and the latest is a plan to heat rooms without heaters—at least, ordinary heaters. It is by electricity, and is invented by a Frenchman, named Hergott. M. Hergott is making at his factory at Valdol, rugs and carpets and curtains, and other hangings and bed clothes, out of a material called thermopile. This material is constructed of wool, silk, or other stuff, woven about fine metallic wire, like the filament in incandescent burners. These stricles, used as such articles usually are wire, like the filament in incandescent burners. These articles, used as such articles usually are in house furnishing, are connected with an ordinary electric wire, and they become warm enough to raise the temperature of a room to 70 or 80 degrees according to the current. They will not take fire and heating from the floor as they do, give a much better distributed heat than by the old way. Bed clothing so warmed does away with all the ordinary blankets and quilts. There are even thermopile nightgowns. Goodness knows, what we'll be having next."

National Banks

"It used to be," said a broker-looking man who had the appearance of having money in his clothes, "that there was a prejudice against national banks, but if there is any of it now, the banks go on growing just the same. Since 1900, there have been 3,167 new banks opened for business, having an aggregate capital of $\frac{1}{2}$!80,458,300. Most of these banks have started in the Middle West and the South, 898 with 54 millions capital, in the former, and 791 with 44 millions capital in the latter. The Western and Pacific states have 906 with 36 millions capital. In the Eastern states, where conditions are different, 519 new banks have three millions more capital than the 900 banks of the West. New England has a showing of only 28 new banks with five millions capital, Hawaii has two, with $600,000 capital, and Porto Rico one with $100,000. Banking has come to the front strongly in Canada, also, the past ten years showing an increase of deposits from 185 millions to 607 millions, and total assets from 320 millions to 809 millions. Money seems to be plenty everywhere, and I guess it is, but still it strikes most of us as about as hard to get hold of now as it ever did. What?"

UFFLED strips for the fronts of UFFLED stripe for the fronts of shirt-waists, are at present very popular. Such an addition dresses up an otherwise plain waist and adds to its attractiveness. If made detachable they can be easily laundered and worn with either thick or thin waists. To make one of these, take a strip of lawn or linen four inches wide and forty-eight inches long; hem both edges very narrowly; then knife plait it very finely. Press on wrong side, leaving in basting threads. Baste a band one half inch wide straight down through the center of plaiting; stitch

The laundering of these ruffles is a slow process, but not difficult. Each plait must be laid exactly in place before being fromed. After ironing, pull out edges, so the ruffle will not lay flat but fluffy at the edges. Some of the ruffles are gathered instead of plaited. In that case use twice the length, or thirty-two inches, instead of three times the length, as is always used for plaiting. Cuffs made in the same way are also worn.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

EXECUTION OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Egbert Maurice, a Confederate general, dies, leaving a wife and daughter, Marcia, and upon her the mother centers all her love and devotion. At seventeen, Marcia meets Allison Kent, a lover of forty, handsome, debonair and wily. There is a clandestine marriage, Mrs. Maurice goes to her child's room to kiss her good night, and finds a farewell letter praying for forgiveness. The mother returns the letter and across it she writes: "My only hope is that God will take me out of the world before I see the face of the child who has disgraced the memory of her father and the name of her mother." Mrs. Maurice is called from Europe by the death of her overseer, Bobert Mitchell, whose wife, Eliza, is sheltered by Mrs. Maurice Loving Marcia, Eliza intercedes with a letter. It is returned unopened. Dr. Eggleston and Bishop Vivian plead for Marcia. The latter gives Mrs. Maurice a letter. Marcia is dying, and he asks the mother to be merciful. Mrs. Maurice writes the word, "Come."

A boy, her dead first born, is laid in Eliza Mitchell's arms. Marcia Kent is brought home. Three days later.

mother to be merciful. Mrs. Maurice writes the word, "Come."
A boy, her dead first born, is laid in Eliza Mitchell's arms. Marcia Kent is brought home. Three days later she dies in her mother's arms, and whispers, "If my baby lives, keep her for my sake," and Eglah Kent is given to the care of the foster-mother, Eliza. At nine years of the wants to know how old she must be before Eliza will tell her why her grandmother hates her father so. Noel Herriott visits Mrs. Maurice and brings papers announcing Judge Kent's marriage to his stepmother, Mrs. Nina Herriott, and then Mrs. Maurice realizes that Eglah is Marcia's baby. She wants to comfort her. It is too late. Noel Herriott will be friendly with Eglah. She only wants her father.

Mrs. Maurice leaves instructions for Eglah's future care. Slowly disease weakens the proud woman. Eliza is wakened from a sound sleep by Eglah. She hears her grandmother call "Egbert," "Marcia." They enter the memorial chamber where Mrs. Maurice sits in the silence that death consecrates.

CHAPTER IV.

MY ONLY JOY IN ALL THE WORLD.

CHAPTER IV.

MY ONLY JOY IN ALL THE WORLD.

ERE it possible to probe the recesses of cerebration by some psychological process as searching as the Roentgen ray, many strange beliefs would be dragged from secretchambers sedulously guarded, where mental fetiches are worshiped. Those who knew Eliza Mitchell well considered her a very pretty, dignified, reticent young widow, who won respect by her adherence to mourning garments—never laid aside after her husband's death; but her rigid observance of the strictest phase of Methodist discipline presented a certain austerity of character that appeared to rebuke quietly even the members of her own denomination who indulged in "the putting on of gold and costly apparel, and taking such diversions" as aforetime were considered appanages of the "fiesh and the devil."

Keenly observant and silently contemplative, she had grown shrewd as a judge of character, and laid the tribute of her confidence at the feet of few; yet this little woman, eminently practical and rigidly orthodox in the faith of her father, had surrendered to one belief that dominated heart, soul, and mind—that ruled her absolutely, and that she jealously guarded from all but her God. Her most intense and precious conviction was that the soul created and intended for her baby boy, who never breathed, had been assigned to the body of Marcia's infant girl born a little later. She was assured that her child had never known life on earth, and had been in his coffin but a few hours when Eglah first opened her eyes. Souls never die. What of the soulless stillborn? Would God deny any Christian mother reunion with her innocent baby in the world of spirits? From the hour that Marcia's wailing child was laid on Eliza's bosom she accepted it as an incarnation of the soul of little Elliot, adrift in space but housed at last in the form committed to her fostering care. Whether this phantasmal belief sprang from feverish conditions under which she first felt the baby's warm lips at her breast, Eliza never questioned; and stition that worshiped idols and believed in transmigration of soul.

After Mrs. Maurice's death, Mr. Whitfield as administrator closed Nutwood, leaving Aaron and his daughter Celia custodians, and Eglah and Eliza went to Washington, where two small rooms were selected for their occipancy in the fashionable "apartments" leased by Senator Kent. His daughter now enjoyed every educational advantage that a governess for modern languages and a tutor for Greek and mathematics could supply, while teachers in the entire range of feminine accomplishments were eager to encourage cultivation of any special talent. In dancing and riding she was found surprisingly proficient, and as Senator Kent was desirous she should enter as tor Kent was desirous she should enter as early as possible a "woman's college" in his native state where one of his sisters was professor, the child was industriously coached to fessor, the child was industriously coached to achieve this purpose.

Standing as it were on the rim of a new world, strewn with the flotsam and jetsam of shattered political, ethical, and domestic systems, where all nations and social conditions found representation, Eglah and Eliza confronted novel customs, strange beliefs, and cosmopolitan diction that clashed sharply on the conservative standards of old Southern usage. Tethered to the pivot of her Methodist discipline, Mrs. Mitchell swung around the narrow circle of conscientious orthodoxy; but Eglah made alarming excursions into ecclesiastical provinces, and their first serious altercation arose from the announcement that the girl had decided to join the class for confirmation in the Episcopal church where Judge Kent worshiped.

firmation in the Episcopal church where Judge Kent worshiped.

"Confirmation? Oh, no; you are too young to take such an important step."

"Now, Ma-Lila, would you say that if I asked to join the Methodist Church?"

"That would be different, because you know more about the Church in which you have been raised."

"I know the Episcopal catechism from cover to cover, and I like the service, and the choristers, and the candles used in some Episcopal churches, and

"Do you forget your dear grandmother, and her love for the church you were christened in, and could you who owe her so much defy in heaven that she never will worry over me any more; and if I am only good enough to go where she is when I die, what difference will it make to her how I got there? Seems to me, Ma-Llla, all this strife over different choice of routes when they go traveling in summer. If we have perfect right to trust our bodies to our favorite railroad, we ought to feel as free to take tickets for our souls on any line that leads to God."

Eliza took the girl's hands and pressed the soit palms to her own cheeks, as she said, in a voice that faltered despite her will:

"My daring, let us wait. Promise me one thing; do nothing for another year at least. For my sake, baby, I beg of you."

Eglah saw unshed tears in the black eyes that had always shone tenderly on her, and rising she stole one arm around the nurse's neck and kissed her unsteady lips.

"Please don't fret about it. You shall have vor wish. Of course I will wait a veer the server was a work work. When will wait a veer the server was a work work. "Yes, Noel, the result far surpasses my hore in thusiasm you spent upon it?"

"Yes, Noel, the result far surpasses my hore of the work, but to receive the grateful acknowledgments of every member of the Order."

"It is a sacred promi e you make me now."

"It is a sacred promi e you make me now."

"It old you I would wait. Did I ever deceive you? You ought to know me better than Mrs. Kent, and even she told father yesterday she had been trying to find out whether I had most talent for the piano or the mandolin, and she concluded I really had no talent for anything—showed only genius for telling the truth."

That night, when she had brushed and braided Eglah's golden-brown hair that no one else ever arranged, she suddenly caught the slim form in a straining embrace.

"God bless my Elliot—my own precious baby!"

"It has been a long time since you called me Elliot, and it sounds queer to give me the name of your boy. Why should you?"
"You are my boy, and my Eglah also; two in one, and my only joy in all the world. Don't argue, dearie; go to sleep."

She lifted her into bed and tucked the silk quilt carefully about her, as though crib days had not ended.
"Ma-Lila, if we should all meet in heaven."

"Ma-Lila, if we should all meet in heaven—and I do hope that somehow I shall get there
—1 am aft id I shall feel puzzled to know who really is my mother, because it seems to me I belong more to you than to anybody else except father; but then grandmother will certainly be there, and she will carry me straight to that special spot—the heavenly 'west-end'
—where all the Maurices dwell, and hand me over to her Marcia: the beautiful one I never saw, my own mother, who would not wait in this world long enough to look at me."
"Hush, my lamb! Good nigh.."

In the adjoining room she sat down at a table where books were piled, and opening one read a marked passage:

"The story was told by the owner of a shop where was sold the amber-tinted syrup of malt given to young children when mi.a could not be obtained. A pale woman in white came very late for many nights to buy a cup of this syrup—midzu amc—but never spoke.

"One night, when she beckoned him to follow, he went with her to the cemetery, where she suddenly vanished in a tomb, and he heard a young child crying under ground. On opening the tomb there was found the corpse of the woman, and by her side a young infant smiling, who had been fed from a cup of midzu ame in the hand of the corpse. The woman had by mistake been prematurely buried. The child was born in the grave, and love—stronger than death—compelled the ghost to provide nourishment for her baby."

Eliza closed the volume and tossed it across the table.

"As if we needed old heathen Japan to teach us the length and breadth and depth and deathlessness of maternal devotion, when we know from the Bible that though God in heaven forsook His Son, the earthly mother clung to Jesus." "Ma-Lila, if we should all meet in heaven—and I do hope that somehow I shall get there
— I am affilid I shall feel puzzled to know heaven forsook His Son, the earthly mother clung to Jesus!"

It was an intensely cold, windless, brilliant moonlight night in January, two years after she came to live in Washington, and when the clock struck eleven sne heard a quick but cautious step in the corridor and a slight tap at her door. Mr. Herriott stood at the threshold and beckoned her to the head of the steps.

"Is Eglah asleep?"
"I think she is."

"Come downstairs quietly."
In the lower hall, where the lights burned brightly, she saw that he looked pale and troubled.

"Mrs. Mitchell, a terrible blow has fallen upon us. Mrs. Kent went sleighing with some friends, and the horses became uncontrollable. The sleigh was over-turned, and poor Nina, thrown against a stone wall, was killed into the Will was debut in the latest and the stone wall. thrown against a stone wall, was killed instantly. Will you do what is best when she is brought home? Don't rouse little Eglah. I am going to find Senator Kent, who is in committee meeting, and break the news as gently as possible. Poor, dear Nina! So merry, so kind hearted! Laughing and chaffing me for my awkwardness when I tucked the lap robe about her feet."

Once more death levelled a wall that in some degree barred Eglah from her father, have been thrown so intimately into her so-human is immutable, and it a man does not improve he grows worse. By the way, is your reverence still 'Brother' Temple, or have you climbed the ladder of spiritual promotion?"

"I am always Vernon to you, but the world knows me as 'Father' Temple. When will you come to us at 'Calvary House' and inspect the rich harvest from the seed you sowed? I long for the one thing you have withheld—your deep, hearty sympathy in my grand and holy work."

your deep, hearty sympathy in my grand and holy work."

"Meaning that nothing less than the three vows will assure you of my safety?"

"That is beyond all that I ever dared to hope, but your cordial approbation would cheer me more than the indorsement of any other man. Generous though you are in financial assistance, your mental attitude toward our Order is that of the smilling tolerance with which one watches a child building a house of cards.

"When will you come to the lovely home you have given us? There is one room we have called 'Founder's,' and set apart for you; and, Noel, no sun sets that has not brought us to our knees in prayer for you who made it possible for us to own a chapel. When shall we welcome you?"

and, Noel, no sun sets that has not brought us to our knees in prayer for you who made it possible for us to own a chapel. When shall we welcome you?"

"Not now. I must go home, where matters need attention. Strange, is it not, that the magic of a name should outlive all it represents? That lonely old stone house staring at its shadow on the lake has no vital element of home except my horses and dogs, and one Maltese cat that sleeps in my armchair. When Nina married Senator Kent the last thread that tied me to anything like domesticity snanped, and I followed my bent and prowled from land to land."

"Why do you not marry some sweet, gentle woman and settle you elf?"

"Scarcely the advice one might expect from the priestly Father of an Anglican celibate order. Has your creed narrowed to such alternatives? Either a cell at Calvary or the snare and disillusions of marriage? Unfortunately for me, women have exerted only a traditional influ nce on my life. My own young mother did. before I could remember her, and I was consigned to tutors when I should have been trundling hoops. I went early to college, and after father's second marriage was rarely at home; hence my acquaintance with women in the home circle is nebulous and legendary. As a boy I disdained sweethearts; as a man they disdain me. The only woman I ever really disdain me. The only woman I ever really disdain me. The only woman is a cell for me at Calvary. Some day at eventide I may creep in, and you will kindly shrive and bless me."

"Mr. Herriott had been leaning back in his chair, with his hands clasped behind his head, and when he rose he tow dix feet two inches, smiling gravely at the upturned face of Father Temple, whose somber clerical habit contrasted vividly with the white yachting flannels worn by his freend.

"Ah, Noel, what a Viking you look! Save prize fighting, is there anything in the realm of athletics you have not accomplished?"

"I fear you would not compliment me with even that civillayed exception if you had seen a skirmish, minus weap crossed the ocean in the same steamer."

"You have not seen her?"

"For a few moments only. She is a beautiful girl."

"What remains to be said—since you accord her the mantle of beauty, whose folds, broader even than charity's, hide all defects? Where shall I begin? Being her cousin, you must know what I have merely heard; that she swept through college like a southern tornado—or should I have said like a meteor?—carrying off the honors, and was the youngest swept through college like a southern tornado —or should I have said like a meteor?—carrying off the honors, and was the youngest graduate who had ever turned the heads of the spectacled lecturers. Yet it appears she values her trophy merely because her laurels pleased her father, at whose feet she sits in adoration.
In her physique, gymnastic training leaves nothing to be improved; she won badges, and can hold her own at basket-ball, tennis, rowing, and swimming. Is not the catalogue complete? So much for mental attainments and physical perfection, but in the domain of womanly emotions she is simply an unknown quantity—a later-day sphinx, fresh and fair before drifting desert sands deface her. If a lover should ever win her heart he will certainly be entitled to it, by the supreme right of discovery. Her affection for Judge Kent absolutely rules her, and in one respect she is unique, she is as utterly incapable of flirtations as an unfledged ow!"

ciety that I hoped you could tell me something of her religious tendencies."

"I am such a confirmed tramp that my visits to the family have been brief and interrupted by long absences. Eglah always appealed peculiarly to my sympathy because of the pathetic antagonism of her environment. tour cousin, Judge Kent, was very much disliked at the South, where sectional political rancor was, is, and will be rife, and his child suffered keenly on that account. When she came North to live, her social surroundings were even worse, because she furiously resented every reflection upon the people of the South, where the Maurices were conspicuous in war records. Her efforts at loyalty all around the circle have not made smooth sailing for her, and her motives were doubtless complex. You are curious about her 'religious tendencies'? If you are wise you will not stir any Calvary leaven into the pure sweet flour of her soul, unless you covet war with that nondescript personage Mrs. Mitchell—an anomalous blend, alert as a lynx, wary as a fox, stealthy as a cougar—who serves Eglah in divers and sundry capacities: an amalgamated foster-mother, housekeeper, maid, companion, chaperon, and confidante. She is a Simonpure puritan, prim as Priscilla, and her processes of reasoning are quite as broad as the edge of a razor. That she viciously opposes all forms of 'ritualism' I happen to know from listening to a discussion between her and Eglah, in which the whole bundle of dogmas was thrashed out, from 'historic episcopate' and 'contession' to incense, candles, and 'reservation of the sacrament.' What a pile of chaff they built! Eglah's appreciation of senuous beauty and classical music inclines her to gorgeous vestments, jeweled windows, and the rhythmic chanting of choristers that lift their chins like Raphael's cherubs, but Mrs. Mitchell finds in the severe simplicity of her own tabernacle an added sanctity, and your Calvary House will be to her that of Rimmon. In Rome Judge Kent had a touch of fever which frightened Eglah into teleg together."

"If Eglah's enthusiasm could be aroused in our mission work, she would wield an incalculable power for good."

our mission work, she would wield an incalculable power for good."

"Vernon—pardon the lapse into argot—
'don't!" Let the child pick her own way to peace. She is not addicted to enthusiasms:
one attack long ago destroyed her susceptibility to subsequent seizures; she can be enthusiastic over only one teraph—her father.
Must you go? Wait a moment. Friendship is frank, and I am sorry to see you losing the vigor that in college days distinguished you.
Fast less, and sleep more. Come home with me and hunt and fish and row, and let other people's souls enjoy a vacation."

As they shook hands Father Temple asked:
"And what have scientific congresses done for your soul, Noel?"

"Drawn me closer, I hope, to the Creator whose subtle and inexorable laws are best revealed to the faithful student that fearlessly analyzes His universal work. The sole aim of scientists is 'to admit nothing false, and to omit nothing true.' Vernon, have faith in me as of old, and keep a cell whitewashed for me at Calvary House. Truly—
"So many paths lead up to God,
"Twere strange if any soul should miss them all."

With his hand on the stair rail the minister paused and looked back.

"So many paths lead up to God,
"Twere strange if any soul should miss them all."

With his hand on the stair rail the minister paused and looked back.

"One thing I wish to ask is whether Eglah had any special admirers abroad? American heiresses are attractive."

"She had as many beaus as she chose to permit. Two attaches of American legations were particularly attentive, and a handsome English naval officer whose father is a duke will doubtless cross the ocean to renew his acquaintance. Possess your soul in patience. Her heart is as sound asleep as when she dreamed in her crib, and the man who wakes and wins it will travel no macadamized road. Before Lent she will be in New York for a week, and when Congress adjourns the family will come to me on the Lake for a visit."

Given a man of thirty-three, unusually good-looking, possessing by inheritance a large fortune, dowered with infinite leisure upon which no professional duties laid intrusive claim, handicapped by no church obligations, and the world assumes that he has inevitably run the gamut of those iniquities set by Satan as snares for the idle rich. Intensely virile as was Noel Herriott, his polished placidity of manner and courteous conservatism masked in some degree the strength and tenacious obstinacy of a character that presented enigmatical phases to those who knew him best. Heredity and education had combined in kneading him physically, mentally, and morally along rather peculiar curves during the plastic period of boyhood, and the finishing touches that determined the mould came from his parting interview with his Presbyterian father, when Fergus Herriott sent him away to college.

"My son, God gave you a remarkably fine body. Neither neglect nor abuse it, but be sure you master it from the start, else you will be the slave of your own flesh. Bad habits are the leeches that would suck a Hercules to effeminacy. Steer as clear of the sins labelled "Thou shelt not" as you would of these be the slave of your own flesh. Bad habits are the leeches that would suck a Hercules to effeminacy. Steer as clear of the sins labelled 'Thou shalt not' as you would of that leper island down in the Pacific. The ten commandments are equal links in the moral chain, and it is no man's privilege to pick and choose which he will break or which he will keep; because if he violates one, it is merely a question of temptation, necessity, and opportunity when he will transgress all. If he bears false witness and lies, he will steal money as he filched character; if he covets his neighbor's wife, the time comes when he murders her husband. You are going where you neighbor's wife, the time comes when he murders her husband. You are going where you will hear much fine talk about 'lofty, broadening, philosophic ideals' and 'progressive, altruistic standards of humanitarianism and honor.' Now mark you, God's laws are not 'progressive,' they are absolutely fixed, and when you are as old as I am you will have learned that 'man's honor,' unless based on them, is merely a sliding scale set up on a quicksand. My boy, try to lead such a clean life that when the mirror of records is held up to you in the final judgment you will not squirm and want to look the other way, and now, my last word is, you had the great misfortune to lose your dear, sweet mother in this world—be sure you deserve to find her in the next."

Points to Remember

Always write on one side of the paper only and leave space between the lines. Write recipes, hints and requests on separate paper in-atead of including them in the letters.

Mail all letters at least THREE MONTHS before the issue for which they are intended.

Always give your correct name and address, as no letter will be published excepting over it. This enables the sisters to write directly to each other.

will be published excepting over it. This enables the sisters to write directly to each other.

Do not write us for samples or patterns of the fancy work which have appeared. When publishing any particular piece of work, we give the plainest possible directions for making and usually illustrate it. It is absolutely uscless for you to write for more information, or for samples, or patterns of anything unless stated that they can be supplied.

As it has come to our notice that sisters have been asking certain sums for information and patterns that should have been furnished free, we here give notice that no charge should be made or money asked for any offers of assistance or information which have or will appear in any letters here published; should there be, kindly notify us, and the offender will be denied the further use of these columns. As this department is run solegy to afford an opportunity for the mutual exchange of ideas, recipes, and helpful information, we do not intend it to be used by anyone for a commercial purpose.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitle you to such a notice. See offer.

All subscribers are cordially invited to write to this department and all stand an equal chance of having their letters appear, whether they are old or new members. As our space is limited, naturally the most interesting helpful letters are selected.

Write fully of your views and ideas, yourself and home-surroundings, "give as freely as ye receive," but if your first letter does not appear, do not feel ut-terly discouraged. Remember the old adage, "if at first you don't succeed, try, try again."

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I first wish to thank you for permitting space for my letters, request, etc., which have been the means of bringing me in touch with many kind friends who nobly responded to my appeal, and second to dear kind sisters, cousins or any of COMPONT's million of readers who have remembered me in my dark hours of suffering and, especially, those who have more than remembered me by sending me help. I wish to impress it on their memory and may those works must as for have done it, unto the least of these my brethren ve have done it, unto the least of these my brethren ve have done it, unto the least of these my brethren ve have done it unto me." I trust these lines will not be your only comfort, but to think how I appreciated all and my poor drooping heart revived at each token of remembrance or gift as a drooping, willted flower from a drop of rain.

I am still suffering great agony and my diseases become more complicated and more serious in many ways worse than a year ago and the end is only a question of time, as I can never recover. I see much to be done, and so many places needed to be filled and so many ways open, I have a dissine to be also an an ways open, I have a dissine to be also an an additional to the sisters and trails.

Now dear sisters, and all who have a mother and are married, or away from home, please bear in mind to go to see mother real often. Your presence is welcome every time you go, be it ever so often and mother is always delighted to see her own. Many witness the loss of mother and then it is too late to make the visits and there is much left undone that can never be done. I know how it is to be without a mother. Many of us never realize the treasure this is an admit while the sisters of a I am one of the limber tongues, I can always find something to talk about. I think the Courport Sisters' Corner is a real enjoyment to many. Th

The outlying shoals of Capes Hatteras, Fear, and Lookout make navigation very dangerous. This state is divided into three natural divisions—the eastern, middle, and western. The eastern is generally low, level, and sandy. The middle is hilly, and the western mountainous. The eastern part of the state was once sea bottom, as is clearly shown by the marl beds, and bones of sea animals found in many localities of this division. One hundred miles from the present coast-line, was found the skeleton of a whale fifty feet long. The portion near the coast is intersected by numerous swamps and marshes. The largest is the Hyde County Swamp and has an area of about three hundred square miles of the Great Dismal Swamp, besides a number of smaller ones.

an area of about three hundred square miles. We also have about one hundred square miles of the Great Dismal Swamp, besides a number of smaller ones.

Some of the finest corn grown in the state is in the well-drained swamp lands. North Carolina is one of the best watered states in the Union. In the eastern region we have the Roanoke. The Indians used to tell the first settlers in the eastern part of the state that the head waters of the Roanoke were in a cave so near the shore of a far-away western ocean, that in stormy weather the salty spray from the breakers would sometimes be dashed into it and there mingled with the river water. The lowlands near the coast are dotted with fresh water lakes. In the eastern division the soil is of a peaty nature and burns readily.

There are few islands on the coast except the long, narrow, sandy islands called "the banks." These are few islands on the water to mark to more than two miles. They are inhabited by a hardy race of people called the "bankers," who subsist mainly by fishing and occasionally by whaling. Sometimes as many as five or six whales are caught in a couple of weeks, usually in the spring, then again none are caught for several years. The "bankers" raise for market a small, tough pony known as the "banks" pony. They receive no care or attention from their owners. Frequently the fresh-water pools on the islands dry up in summer. Then a pony wishing to drink goes to the bed of the pool, paws a hole into the sand where the water soon rises, and thus he gets all the water he wants. In the region of Nag's Head the winds blow the sand into large hills, some of which are more than forty 1 et high. They form on the ocean side . I the banks, and in a few years the winds move them across the banks into the Sound. Nothing can stop them, hotels and cottages being frequently buried by them on their journey from the beach to the Sound.

the mountain. I am sure you would enjoy it. I have been to the top several times. One can see the Ridge Mountains on a clear day and they are one hundred miles away; of these, Mitchell's High Peak is the highest land east of the Mississippi. It attains an elevation of 6,688 feet above the sea-level. The journey from Montreal to Mt. Mitchell is fifteen miles and part of the way has to be made on the backs of mules, the rest walked. The mountain is named in honor of Dr. Mitchell, whose life was lost so many years ago in the pool on the top of the mountain. His body was in perfect preservation after having been in the water eleven days. In the mountain section, the air is singularly pure and healthful. The summers are cool and refreshing. There is in this section a peculiar belt, frost sufficient to injure fruits and vegetables, is unknown. This belt of exemption from frost is found on both sides of the mountains. The lines of exemption are so sharply defined that there, sometimes, stands out before the eye a horizontal belt of verdure between parallel ines above and below of flowers and foliage that have been killed by frost.

Formerly three fourths of the mica used in the world was supplied by North Carolina. Natural objects of interest are numerous and are found mostly in the western section. We find the Hickory Nut Gap, a deep pass in the Blue Ridge, Table Rock, and the curious pile of stones in the form of an inverted pyramid called "Ginger Cake Rock."

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have just moved into this community of "Comfort Sisters" but don't intend to wait for them to call. I intend to push right in, and contrary to the advice given to children, I shall be "heard and not seen."

I have tried almost every suggestion found in this valuable paper, from putting vinegar in the lamps to make them burn brightly, to rubbing the top of my cook stove with molasses and water, and much as I have read there are still a few things I would like to know and some suggestions I would like to make.

Miss Clara Bliss. You gave directions for making Easter lilies. I want you to try crystallizing your paper flowers and report result. Get some paraffine (you can get quite a large plece at the drugstore for ten cents), after your flower is finished melt the paraffine, and while hot, dip the flower in it. It will look as though it is ruined, but it isn't. If any of the leaves are doubled up, take a toothpick and carefully straighten them, and set the flower in a tumbler until it gets cold and it will be perfectly hard and appears to be covered with ice. carpeting, and it hides all the warp, makes good heavy rugs, always better than when woven like common carpet. I made my rug machine two years ago, and I think it is a good, cheap way to make rugs. After you have woven six or eight inches in length you will notice it begins to draw in from the sides and get narrower; to avoid this I thread some warp in my darning needle and pass through edge of new rug and around side of frame, pull tight and tie It, some on both sides, you will need to repeat this about every six inches or less to keep rug even wiath.

We live on a homestead on what is called a desert, in southern Oregon, near the rushrag, roaring Rogue river, and just on the opposite side of the river is old Table Rock mountain, where about forty-five years ago, the whites had a battle with the Indians, and one old Indian chief took his squaw in his arms and leaped over the two hundred foot wall of rock, rather than to surrender.

I love the dear old mountains, and we are surrounded by them; it reminds me of a mammoth dish with the mountains for the edge, they are all several miles from us except old Table Rock, it seems most like we might reach out and touch it.

As Mrs, Laura Wester has told us of some excellent ways to make a little pin money I will add my mite by telling how my daughter and I made a few dollars during the rainy days in winter. We were in town for the winter so the children could go to school, and we made over thirty erochet circular shawls, just before Christmas; we had to sit up late into the nights to fill our orders in time. We also made splashers by painting designs of birds or flowers on white ollcloth. They look neat, take well, are durable, and can be easily cleaned with a datop cloth. I found some pretty agates on the desert that I sent to a jeweler in New York and received a good price for them.

Will some sister that lives where palmetto grows, please send me enough palmetto to braid me a sun hat? I will return favor anyway I can.

I have started a silk and worsted crazy quilt. I have started a silk and worsted crazy quit. Have any of the sisters more pieces than they know what to do with? If so, they would be greatly appreciated. Some other time I want to tell you how a smart old lady earned her clothes. I wish all many happy days, with Comfort to read always.

MRS. NETTIE HAYES, Central Point, Oregon.

MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have taken COMFORT for three years and have never written but one letter and as it failed to appear I thought I would try again. I live in Butler County, the "buckwheat" county of the state, in a little village called Petersville. The town was so called after Peter McKinney who once owned all the land on which the town is situated. The nearest railroad is at Reibold, two miles away, but we are now getting a trolley line right through the town.

We have three general stores, and one drug store and three churches. My husband is clerk in one of the general stores, and one drug store and three churches. We have been married three years. We had a little daughter, but she was called to a better home. We have no other children and I get very lonesome.

I am five feet end inches tail, have gray eyes and brown hair and weigh one hundred and thirty-seven pounds. I have traveled a good deal though I am only twenty-one years old. I have been in five states, Pa., Col., Conn., N. Y., and Ill.

I am now going to tell you of my mother's trip to Alaska, in 1898. My father died when I was quite small so mother has been more or less of a wanderer ever since. She was a dressmaker by trade but her health gave out and the doctors said she should take a seavoyage; and she went to Alaska. When she got there she did a little sewing and sometimes cooked for miners and washed and mended their clothes, and finally she established a "road house" as they are called in Alaska, in this country it would be called a boarding house. She had a canvas tent and two cabins built of logs. On top of the logs they piled moss, which kept the water out. In the canvas tent she had a grocery store and through the middle of it ran a long table made of boards, off of which they ate. Directly behind the grocery were the two cabins, one behind the other. The first was called the "messhouse" or place where she cooked and slept. The other was called the "bunkhouse" or where the men slept. The "bunks" were built in the form of shelves on the wall, one above another. She sold bread, served lunches, twenty-five cents for a cup of coffee and a sandwich, kept boarders and mended clothes. In that country gold is the only money they use and this is weighed on gold-scales when buying anything. The country is beautiful. The trees built in the form of shelves on the wall, one above another, she sold bread, served lunches, twenty-five cents for a cup of coffee and a sandwich, kept boarders and mended clothes. In that country gold is the only money they use and this is weighed on gold-scales when buying anything. The country is beautiful. The trees built in the form of shelves on the wall, one above another is no wind so it is not noticed as much as our Pennsylvania winters. The lee breaks up in June and it is an old saying among the miners that a newcomer is a "Chechocka" (Indian for white man) until

DEAR EDITOR AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I hail from the dear old Wolverine State, and as I have never seen a letter from this little village, I thought I would like to come in for a few moments' chat with you.

How many of you ever made scrapbooks? I presume a good many of you have some time, and I wish to tell you about mine.

I procure large, well-bound books (generally they are state statistics of old date), which may be had for the asking. I take the shears and cut out every other leaf. I then take a pen and ink and page the remainder and on the last two or three blank leaves, which I have left on purpose, I arrange my index in alphabetical order.

My first volume is for household hints. In it

My first volume is for household hints. In it I paste all useful information whether it concerns the family, the kitchen, nursery, sewingroom, or any part of the house.

My second and third are for history and biography. In them are to be found all clippings of prose and poetry (my old papers and magazines are mere skeletons), relating to the history of our country during the different epochs, pictures of buildings at the various expositions, portraits of great men and women with cuts of birthplace and burial spot when obtainable, also their biographies.

My fourth and last is for pictures only; and contains all of the best wood cuts of scenery that I could find, also colored plates of fruit and flowers.

Having poor health I spend many hours in reading and I have gained much historical and other valuable knowledge, besides a great deal of pleasure from these books.

"In the ragged old books all tattered and torn, Are badly soiled leaves by constant use worn; The backs have a crack, And of gilt there's a lack;

And of gilt there's a lack;
The corners are bent and the binding forlorn.
But never were books made by book maker's art
Could be so precious by half to my heart.
No gold you could hold,
No jewels untold
Could bribe me from my scrapbooks to part."

I am a great lover of music, all kinds of fancy work, and flowers.

CONDUCTED BY UNCLE CHARLIE

EPTEMBER is here, and I wish you all many happy returns of my birthday. This historic event happened on the 5th of September, some centuries back. I'm not quite sure what year, but I think it was in the year 0 before one was invented. I did know how old I was once, but my birth certificate got burned up in a fire that devastated my chicken-coop a few years ago, and I never knew after that what my age was. Toby says I am older than Methusaleh's buck goat, and perhaps he is right. I remember when Christopher Columbus landed in Columbus, Ohio, and he remarked then that he thought it was nearly time I applied for an old age pension, but I changed my mind, and ever since I have been growing younger. Growing old is foolishness. Cut it out! I am a year younger this year than I was last year at this time. If I keep on at this rate, I shall soon be in long clothes, and chewing a rubber rinz, and sucking a milk bottle. I have got back to the infantile period anyway, as far as being hairless and toothless is concerned, and I can say "goo goo" like the real thing. All I want now is a waist band, and a bunch of safety pins sticking in my hide, and a good dose of colic, and I would be right back in the bee-yutiful baby days of yore.

Now I want you to understand right here that I don't want this auspicious event, my a waist band, and a bunch of sately pins sticking in my hide, and a good dose of colic, and I would be right back in the bee-yutiful baby days of yore.

Now I want you to understand right here that I don't want this auspicious event, my birthday anniversary, to go by without getting six million letters—that is one from each reader of Comfort. I want each letter to contain seven one year "subs" to Comfort, and in return for that service I will send you one of my books of poems. You get a fifty cent book and eighty-four numbers of Comfort for one dollar and five cents. The Lord knows that ought to satisfy you if nothing else does. If an offer like this does not make you get action, not even an earthquake would get you moving. Remember also that not only are you,paying a compliment to me, but you are spreading Comfort far and wide, and Comfort is what the world needs. Comfort ought to go into ten millions of homes. and it would if you boys and girls would get a wiggle on. This paper is a power for good, and this League helps more helpless people than all the societies and organizations in the U. S. put together. Ask the shut-ins if anyone helps them as we do. Other people and other organizations hand out sympathy and tell the sick how to die comfor ably and go to Heaven, and they give them a beautiful obiturry notice when they are dead. Shut-ins don't want to die, life is as sweet to them as anyone, and my object is to put some life, and hope and good grub into their frail bodies and keep them alive. They will go to Heaven when their time comes and they don't want to be packed off to another world on the double-quick, by people who want to send them there with a diet of talk and tracts. Christ fed the multitude as well as preached to them. He gave bodily food as well as spiritual. Christ did not give the sick tracts and sympathy, and suggest that they hurry up and die and go to Heaven. Christ healed them, and gave them health, and strength, so they could enjoy life and live out their natural term of years on this less and nourishing article of diet. But I have a grudge against cheese and I will tell you why. I once had a very bad cold on my chest, and was threatened with inflammation of the stove pipe and appendicitis of the undervest. My boarding-house lady was Dutch, and she had two religions, one was sauer-kraut the other was Limburger cheese. When she was not worshiping at the shrine of cheese, she was prostrating herself before the altar of sauerkraut. When I got down sick, Mrs. Dutch came up to my room, and told me only one thing could save my life and that was a Limburger cheese poultice, and she clapped one on my chest before I could scream "Police' one time's once. Well, I stood that poultice for one hour—for I honestly believed the old lady was giving me the straight goods and it alone would save my life. If you had seen me lying there, with that essence of violets under my smeller, holding my nose with one hand, and gasping for breath with the other, you'd have screamed. Finally I tried to tear the awful thing off, but couldn't as I found the old lady had nailed it on and screwed it down. Then I got another boarder to 'phone for the doctor. After an agonizing suspense of twenty minutes the physician appeared in the doorway with the landlady. Directly "Doc" got his nose inside the door, he began to sniff and then to cough. Then he turned to the landlady and said: "Madam, how long has he been dead?" "He no vos yoost sick, mit some grippes on der chest!" "Madam," replied the landlady," he vos yoost sick, mit some grippes on der chest!" "Madam," replied the landlady." Then le turned to the landlady and said: "Madam, how long has he been dead?" "He no vos dead yet," replied the landlady." Then li jumped out of bed and tore the poultice from my chest and said, "Doc, I'm not dead, I've just got an attack of cheeseitis on the chest;" and I waved the poultice in his face, and he screamed "Murder!" and fell in a faint. Then I went into the back yard, burned the poultice and got out of town as fast as the train could ca

How many times I have been harmoniously have made to the country the same state of the country the same state of the country that is not found to do the farmers out there take their milk to a cheese factory. I will tell you how cheese is made. About nine o'clock in the morning all the milk is put in one or more large vats. A quantity of rennet is put on, to bring it just to the boiling point, for two fours. Then the whey is run off, the curd washe and spread on long porous tables. It made and spread on long porous tables. It made in a machine which takes out all the card washe and spread on long porous tables. Ellen, I am much interested in your account of farm life and cheese making. I am very fond of cheese, its someone will first take the cheese into the backyard, chloroform it, kill it, and drive the smell out of it with an are. Even if I am in prison and a convict (Oh! how the name makes the shivers run up my spine) I do not consider myself a criminal at heart. I thank God for showing me my great mistake as without it I would have been no doubt led to a greater evil. It is not the name God looks on when He judges us nor on the appearance, but on the heart. I can be called a convict, criminal or any other such name but that alters me in God's sight not at all. So, dear readers, respect your dear mothers and treat them as you would want to be treated in your old age.

Trusting that I may soon see this in print for it no doubt, will be a help to a great many, I remain,

There, let that lesson sink into your hearts. You see what happens when a boy turns a deaf ear to his mother's advice, and starts out to be a "sport" and go with a fast set of young people with whom he is unable to keep the pace. This is an age of extravagance, an age of fake and sham. A young man wno earns $10 a week is expected to dress as well, and keep up the same appearance as those who earn treble the amount. A young man has not the moral courage to tell his companions that his wages are small and that he cannot keep up with them unless he becomes a thief. The ones who are to blame for this young man's ruin are the young women of his home town. A girl knows that automobile rides, dances, suppers, flowers, theater parties, cost a whole pile of money. One such typee as you see, cost the writer of this letter twenty-five dollars, and it ruined him and landed him in jail. The girl got the fun, and it did not cost her a cent in money, nor send her to jail, though I think, and I know hundreds will agree with me, that those girls who let a man lavish money on them, knowing full well that the man's income does not warrant the outlay, are morally as guilty as he, and ought to go to jail with him. Half the young men who go wrong, owe their ruin to their girl friends, who permit them to lavish their money on giving them what they call "good" times, and the majority of these so-called good times are really the worst kind of bad and wicked times. I wonder how the young men on his last twenty-five dollar spree felt I remain, "ONE WHO INTENDS TO DO BIGHT." bad and wicked times. I wonder how the young woman who accompanied this young man on his last twenty-five dollar spree felt after she knew his efforts to give her a few hours' fun, had landed him in state's prison. I would also like to know what the fathers and mothers of these young seminary girls would think, if they knew their daughters were chasing around at all hours with boys of the town in autos. There is a custom obtaining in a certain country in Europe, which we might adopt here. A girl over there will not let a man spend money on her, as it is considered bad form, unladylike, and in a sense places her under an obligation to the spender. I know girls who openly boast that such and such a man of their acquaintance spent a whole month's salary on giving them a good time. I have known other girls (God bless them) who have positively declined to go to theaters, supper and dances with young men, because they knew they were not in a financial position to have positively declined to go to theaters, sup-per and dances with young men, because they knew they were not in a financial position to spend a lot of money up them for a few hours' pleasure. The mainity of young men can hardly keep themselves, and if they start cut-ting a wide gash with the girls, they have either to borrow, get credit and go into debt, or steal.

either to borrow, get credit and go into debt, or steal.

Most of the boys who are ready to go to jail to give a girl a good time, if they were married to the same girl would not give her ten cents to buy a ribbon, or a bill to buy shoes, unless forced to. The young man who won't fool away his money on giving girls a good time is called stingy, but he is the one who is saving his money and who can and will give a girl a good home, though he sensibly declines to give her champagne suppers, or moonlight rides in automobiles. Girls, think this matter over. Your influence over boys for good is enormous, and you have also only got to give him the least encouragement, and he will rob a bank to make himself solid with you. What the son of a millionaire does, the ten dollar a week clerk will ? if he can. It is cily natural, for none of us like to be the ten dollar a week clerk will ? if he can. It is (1) natural, for none of us like to be outshone in the eyes, of the girls we admire. I agree with all the writer of this letter says, but I also think it is a great mistake to send anyone to prison for a first offence of this kind. We should have a "first offence act." Let the offender be severely admonished by the judge, and warned that if he is arrested again, he will receive a double sentence, and will have to explate both crimes by a long term in prison. If a man breaks the law twice we know he is bad stuff, and a criminal at heart, and the sooner he is behind the bars the better. But don't imprison a man and ruin his life, because, as in the case of the writer of this letter, he took a few dollars to give a feather-brained idiot of a girl—the worst possible kind of a so-called "good time."

There, Clifton, I think that ought to get me a situation anywhere. I saw a headline in a New York paper a few years ago: "THE EUROPEAN SITUATION," and I went all the way to Europe to look for it, only to find there was no situation at all. I had to walk back, and it was wet walking all right, all right. Some of the waves needed paving and macadamizing as they were extremely rough and needed a lot of grading. Later on I saw in the papers in big letters: "THE EUROPEAN CONCERT," and off I went to Europe to see if I could not get a job to sing at the concert. I offered to sing for a whole week for a dollar and ten cents but it was no use, for I found out there was no concert at all. Three old fool kings over there were holding a powwow, and that was what the ginks called a concert. Cliff, I'm just disgusted the way people put fool things in the paper, and mislead the innocent goons like myself. Now, Clif, honest, I want that situation, and if you can't hold it for me, call in the marine guard and the warships and get them to hold it, as I am tired of being frozen up here in Maine, and more tired still of telling the Buttinskies it takes twenty cents won't even gain a peep under the canvas.

DEAR UNCLE:

I received my membership card and button all O. K., and I think they are real nice. I am a stave dresser by trade, and am sixteen years of age, five feet six inches high, weight one hundred and fifty pounds. Have dark hair, and Uncle, I hardly know how to describe my eyes, as one is brown and one blue.

Uncle, I wish you would come down and help me dress staves. I live in Kentucky, and this state is noted for its fine horses and pretty girls. I will close, I hope I will see this in print, so good by Uncle, and all of the cousins.

Jas. Bland (No. 17,895).

Jim, I would like nothing better than to come down and help you dress staves, but the fact of the matter is I would be of very little use in a business of this kind. I never dressed a stave in my life, and I am perfectly, utterly, entirely and completely ignorant of the details of a stave's toilet. To be candid and frank with you, Jimmy, I don't even know what sex a stave belongs to, whether it is feminine, masculine, or neuterine. I would not know whether to put pants on a stave, or a skirt, corset and hip pads. The odds are I might dress a stave in pants and a plug hat, only to find you hopping mad because I had not togged it out in a chemise, petticoat and straw bonnet. I never was much of a dresser anyway. A friend sent me one of those new combination suits of underwear once, and I thought it was a neck muffler, and wore it to a prayer meeting, and it raised a riot and I got read out of the church. In fact I was more than read out, I was thrown out. My ideas of clothing always were primitive.

When I was visiting Europe I was ordered to attend a court function and be presented to attend a court function and be presented to the King of England. I went dressed in a pair of overalls, a flannel shirt, and a smile of condescension. When I got to the door, the court flunkeys told me to come back in regulation court dress. I asked a friend of mine who had been presented at court a good many times, what kind of a dress was needed, and he said it was a coat of paint and pants to match. So I painted myself from the head up and feet down with a nice coat of paint—red, white and blue, and then I started out to get presented at court, and you bet I got presented this time, and I made such a hit that they insisted on my remaining at court one month. I forgot to mention that it was a police court. No, Jim, I won't attempt to dress staves for you. A man who can't dress himself has no right to be foolin

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

A dispute arises between Madge Mason and Annie Kelly, two girls of the street, and Madge Mason springs upon Annie like a tigress. Dave Lane, a good-natured lad of fifteen pulls them apart. Ralph Straight, who buys papers of Madge, places his hand on her shoulder. He is surprised and asks the girl to go with him. The boys mistake him for a fly cop, and Dave tells him if the girl is in trouble he'll go bail for her. Ralph turns to Madge; it is a pity for a girl like her to be selling papers on the street for a living. He will get a place for her in the bindery. His sister Alice will show her. Madge goes to Ralph's home, and she opens her heart to Mrs. Straight and tells of her mother and the counsel she gave when dying. "It 'link dey's kep' me good more dan any-ving else." Ralph walks home with Madge and there is no happier girl in New York City.

Shirley Bverton, at sixty, retires from business to enjoy his wealth and the companionship of his son whose tastes are different. It is whispered that Mr. Everton has been a little wild. The father dies suddenly leaving Shirley sole heir to his estate. Hereceives a visitor, Richard Harold, who convinces Shirley he is not the only heir. There is indisputable evidence of a child by a former marriage. Shirley cannot buy the papers but he can his silence. The price is one half million. It is absurd. Shirley will pay well for the proof of the girl's death. There is a rap and Harold is confronted by a shabbily dressed old man. He passes the papers to him and tells what Shirley demands. Stamwix is in a rage that he divulges where the girl is to be found.

A big printing press is in the place where Alice Straight works. Her seat is near a slowly revolving wheel eneircled by a belt. Her hair blows dangerously near the belt. A well-dressed young man asks Dave Lane if Madge Mason works there. Dave points to Alice, whose hair becomes entangled. Madge comprehends the situation and selzes a pair of shears to cut her hair. Shirley Everton grasps the gi

CHAPTER V.

A GLANCE AT THE PAST.

FTER his interview with Richard Harold, Shirley Everton had a long interview with himself.

Though it was after midnight when Harold left him, Everton was in no mood for sleep. His valet, seeing that he was disturbed in mind, urged him to go the ball, but the event of the season had no charms for him now, and he harshly ordered the man to bed, accompanying the command charms for him now, and he harshly ordered the man to bed, accompanying the command with an oath so forcible that Tompkins fairly gasped for breath, scarcely able to believe that the expression could have proceeded from the lips of his usually mild and Anglomaniacal master.

Yes, Shirley Everton was seriously disturbed in mind, and no wonder.

The whispers regarding his f ther's past life referred to in a former chapter had reached his ears, but had not disturbed him to any serious extent.

is extent.

But the sudden revelation of the startling

But the sudden revelation of the startling fact that Shirley Everton, the leading member of St.—'s Church, the philanthropist, the trustee in a dozen or more religious and benevolent societies, was at heart a scoundrel, came like a clap of thunder from a clear sky. The evidence was indisputable, however; the documents presented by Harold proved the truth of every word he said.

Ahe marriage certificate bore the names of Shirley Everton and Anna Hilton; the clergyman who had performed the ceremony was alive, as were the witnesses.

The certificate of birth bore every mark of genuineness, and Everton knew that the letters presented by Harold were really in his father's handwriting.

Love letters they were, everyone breathing

Love letters they were, everyone breathing devotion.

Alas! how soon those vows of fidelity had

Alas! how soon those vows of fidelity had been forgotten.

The documentary evidence produced by Harold was confirmed by a thousand and one incidents, each one trifling in itself, that Shirley Everton recalled as he reflected upon the strange story to which he had just listened. There could be no doubt of it; his father, the wealthy, the respected Shirley Everton, upon whose tombstone were inscribed his many supposed virtues, was a hypocrite, a whited sepulcher.

"What could have induced him to commit such an act of folly, of madness?" groaned young Everton, as he paced the floor of his room, much to the wonder and discomfort of his valet, who was trying to get to sleep in the adjoining apartment.

Shirley Everton had something to think of Shirley Everton had something to think of now beside the latest London styles.

What could have induced old Shirley Everton to commit such an act of folly?

What could have induced old Shirley Everton to commit such an act of folly?

It was the old, old—yet ever new—story.
When he was a young man, accident had thrown him and Anna Hilton together.
Her station in life was of the humblest; she could neither read nor write.
But she had a face and form over which a poet or a sculptor would have gone mad.
It is no wonder that Shirley Everton, young, romantic, susceptible—very different from the hard-headed Shirley Everton of later years—fell deeply in love with her.
His social position, though not very high, was much better than her own, and it was a sacrifice to marry her.
His expectations—afterward realized—were great, and Anna Hilton was not the woman to share the honors he expected to gain.
After a long conflict with himself, he married her.
He did not keep her in ignerance of his mission to reveal the truth.

To the untutored girl this oath had a terrible significance, and she kept it until the end.
Within two years an opportunity for what the French call "a marriage of convenience," presented itself to Shirley Everton.

He was young, handsome, talented; a brilliant future seemed to stretch out before him. and a wealthy family sought, almost begged, alliance with his.

It was a terrible temptation,
A marriage with Alida Fenton, the daughter of the millionaire banker, meant wealth and fame for him.

His first marriage was still a secret—might

His first marriage was still a secret—might ever remain so.

Some men would have spurned the thought of an act which must ever lower them in their own estimation, even if the world remained ignorant of their villainy.

But Shirley Everton was not such a man. He was married to Alida Fenton at Grace Church, amidst pomp and splendor, while his legitimate wife was living in comparative poverty in a lowly down-town tenement.

Thereafter he led a ouble life.

He had two wives, two homes.

Neither woman was aware of the existence of the other.

Neither woman was aware of the existence of the other.

Perhaps Mrs. Everton No. 1 would have learned of the birth of Shirley Everton, J, through the daily papers; but she could not read, and as all her friends knew her as Mrs. Mason, i never occu red to anyone that she could have any possible interest in that momentum avent.

stason. I never occu red to anyone that she could have any possible interest in that momentous event.

Soon after the birth of Madge, Everton deserted his first wife altogether.

He caused reports of his death to reach her ears, and she mourned him sincerely.

It a bold step, but it succe Jed.

Husband and wife lived in the same city: every day the banker, or his way down-town, passed within a stone's throw of his first wife's wretched dwelling; sometimes he bought a paper of his dughter—of whose identity, however, he was not aware.

Thus he lived for years, and when he cied his secret remained unsuspected.

Does this seem incredible, reader?

It is no fancy sketch, it is the plain, unvarnished truth.

Almost e ery morning we see some start-

It is no fancy sketch, it is the plain, unvarnished truth.

Almost e ery morning we see some startling item in the paper of which we say: "If I had read that in a story I should have considered it impossible."

Truth is, indeed, stranger than Fiction.

With all the chances against the success of his vile plot, Shirley Everton managed to deceive the world, and to live and die a respected, honored citizen.

But "murder will out," and now the hideous skeleton had stalked out of the closet and stood confronting young Shirley byerton.

It seemed to grimly ask him:

"What are you going to do about it?"

He was in the power of Richard Harold.

The marriage certificate, the certificate of birth, the letters which the unhappy woman to whom they were addressed had been unable to read, were all evidence against him.

At a word from Harolc his wealth, his position, even his name 'ould be taken from him.

The thought was maddening.

He knew enough of the world to place very little reliance in the promi es of Richard Harold.

After meditating upon the situation until the gray light of dawn began to peep into the room, he retired to rest, and slept uneasily until nearly noon.

Then, refusing the offices of Tompkins, much

Then, refusing the offices of Tompkins, much to that worthy flunky's dismay, he made a hasty toilet an sallied out with a new purpose in view—to find his half-sister, Mauge pose in view—to find his half-sister, Madge Mason.

Harold had told him that she was a newsgirl, and had informed him where he would be likely to find her.

He went, therefore, to the corr r of Park Row and Frankfort Street, and catechized the numerous youngsters who were engaged in plying their vocation there.

They all knew Madge, but none of them was able to tell h m where to find her.

"She ain't been here terday," said An:'e Kelly, "an' I don't t'ink she'll show up ag'in jes' yet, fer she knows I'm a-layin' fer her."

Twice afterward 'verton went in search of the girl, and he had come to the conclusion that Harold had smitted her away, when he learned from one of the boys, a friend of Dave Lane's, that she had found employment in tanley's book-bindery.

To that establishment he proceeded at once, and rea d it just as the girls came trooping out for dinner.

"Just my luck!" he muttered. "Now, which one of these creatures is she, I wonder? Perhaps she isn't among them. I'll go in and make some inquiries."

haps she isn't among them. I'll go in and make some inquiries."
He vont in, and the result of his inquiries we have seen.
Dave Lane, believing him to be a "masher," pointed out Alice Straight as Madge

When Alice's hair became entangled in the

When Alice's nair became entangled in the belt the thought occurred to Everton that Fate had interfered in his favor, and that the girl who stood between him and fortune was about to be removed without any interference on his part.

So when Madge attempted to rush forward and rescue Alice he seized her in his arms so tightly that she was powerless to free herself.

CHAPTER VI.

"THERE IS A MYSTERY HERE."

"Let me go!" fairly shrieked Madge again, as she struggled vainly to free herself from Everton's grasp.

"Not yet

"Not yet, my beauty," cried Everton in a hoarse whisper, "not yet."

See first page illustration.

But the next instant he received a blow on the head that caused him to release his hold on the girl and reel backward with a cry of rage and pain.

The blow was dealt by the hard fist of Dave

It had occurred to the boy after he got downstairs that Alice might possibly be annoyed by the supposed "masher," and he had run up again, reaching the head of the stairs just in time to see Madge struggling in Everton's grasp.

While a myriad of stars were still dancing before the millionaire's eyes, Dave, who had not observed Alice's peril, cried:

"Got here just in time, didn't I, Madge? No show for mashers while I'm around, yer bet. But—" bet. But—"

He paused in open-mouthed astonishment, for Madge had rushed into the workroom with the lightness and speed of a frightened with the lightness and speed of a frightened fawn.

Glancing in, he saw the frightful position in which Alice was placed.
He instantly followed Madge.
But the girl had not lost a moment.
Seizing the shears, she ran up to Alice, and with one quick movement severed her long, flowing tresses close to the head.
In another i stant she would have been too late.

late.
"Madge," gasped the terrified girl, "you have saved—".

The words died away in an inarticulate murmur, and she sank fainting to the floor.

"Go fer water, Dave—quick!" cried Madge.

"Git a move on yer now."

"By Jingo!" exclaided Dave, lingering a moment, "it's too blamed bad about dat purty hair o 'hern! Why, she ain't got no more left 'n I have."

"Well, ain't it a lot better dan ef she'd lost her life?" cried Madge. "Hurry up, now! W'at's der matter wid yer?"

While Dave rushed off to get the water, Everton, outside the door, gazed admiringly at Madge.

Everton, outside the door, gazed admiringly at Madge.

"By Jove!" he muttered, "how did that divinity drop down in this vile locality. She's a study—a goddess in arnate with a Bowery dialect. And, by Jove, how strangely she looks like father around the eyes. If she had been pointed out to me as Madge Mason I'd have believed it—she's much more like the family than the real one."

S. irley Everton was quick-witted. He had already made up his mind what to do.

He would not attempt to leave the place while attention was attracted from him; he would remain and "face the music."

So he stepped into the room, assumed a smile, and addressing Madge, said:

"Do not be alarmed. Miss Mason has only fainted."

Madge looked up with flashing eyes.

Madge looked up with flashing eyes. Madge looked up with flashing eyes.

"How dare yer speak ter me, yer cowardly dude? Ef yer'd had yer way dis young lady'd ha' been dead or disfiggered fer life by dis time. An' who are yer callin' Miss Mason?"

"Why?" gasped Everton, "isn't that the young lady's name?"

"No, it ain't; it's my name—Madge Mason, an' I ain't got no reason to be ashamed of it."

"But he—that young man who just went out—told me that her name——"
"Was Madge Mason?"

"Was Madge Mason?"
"Yes."
"Well, den, he sized yer up fer a masher, an put up a job on yer. See?"
"Dat's der size of it." added Dave, coming in with a pitcher of water at that moment. "But I sized him up wrong, fer he's worse nor a masher. Ef he'd had his way Alice 'd be dead now. Der's some deep-laid plot in all dis."
"You are mistaken, my good fellow, you are, by Jove!" protested Everton, assuming a conciliatory air.
"Am I?" sneered Dave. "Was I born dis mornin'? Sa-ay! what d'yer take me for?"
"So he t'ought she was me," said Madge, who had been bathing Alice's pallid face with the contents of the pitcher. "What grudge has he got ag'inst me? I never seen him before in me life."
"My dear, Miss Mason," began Everton, with an oily smile, "you were never more mi aken. Do you know why I seized you and tried to prevent you from going to this young lady?"
"Yes—yer wanted her to git killed."
"How absurd!" exclaimed the millionaire.

"Yes—yer wanted her to git killed."
"How absurd!" exclaimed the million "Yes—yer wanted her to git killed."
"How absurd!" exclaimed the millionaire, with a shocked look. "I believed that you would imperil your life, and I detained you to prevent you from sharing the young lady's fate. I was wrong, as it has turned out, but r motives were certainly good."
"I don't take no stock in dat yarn," said Madge decidedly.
"Me nc'4er." added Dave with a lowering glance at Everton. "Say, Madge, shall I chuck him downs.airs?"
"No, let up on him." directed Madge. "Dat lump on der side of his head is enough for one dose."
The "lump on der side of his head," which had been inflicted by Dave, was paining Everton not a little, and if he could have followed the bent of his own inclinations he would have punished the young workman severely.

And he could have done it, for he was by

But policy forbade, and wreathing his features—not without some difficulty—into a smile, he said:

"My young friend, I bear you no ill-will for the blow you gave me, for your motives were praiseworthy, although you were laboring under a mistake. If I had been in your place I should have done the same thing."

This speech somewhat impressed Dave.

"D'yer mean dat, mister?" he said.

"Certainly I do."

"Will yer answer me one question?"

"Certainly I do."
"Will yer answer me one question?"
"A dozen, if you like."
"Den how was it dat yer happened ter come here a-askin' fer Madge?"

name?"
Everton hesitated a moment.
He was, however spared the immediate necessity of replying by the sudden appearance on the scene of Ralph Straight.
The young foreman sprung forward with a cry of alarm as his eyes rested upon the motionless figure of his sister.
As he knelt beside her, her eyelids quivered and the nonemed.

In a few moments she was quite herself

In a few moments she was quite herself again.

Then the situation was explained to Ralph alternately by Madge and Dave, Everton standing quietly by meanwhile.

When they had finished what, it must be confessed, was not a very intelligible story, Ralph turned to the millionaire and said sternly:

"Well, sir, how do you explain all this?"
The words, the tone and the gesture that

A TRIP TO NEW YORK.

ERRY could scarcely believe the evidence of his senses as he perused the letter sent to him by Mr. Henry Maxwell.

"Can this be true?" he asked himself.

"Am I at last to find out who I really am? Oh, if only it is true!"

"You seem to be mightly interested, Jerry," observed the landlord curiously.

"I am," was the answer.

"From some friend in New York, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

"And good news?"
"Very, Mr. Hill. But I can't stop to tell you about it now. I've got to get home," and without saying more the boy hurried from the without saying more the boy hurried from the tavern.

He felt as if he was treading on air. The trip to New York was enough to elate him. But what if he should find his parents, and what if they should be rich!

"I wish I could fly to New York," he muttered. "Somehow, it seems to me I won't be able to get there quick enough. So Mr. Maxwell is a friend to Henry Davenport's father, the major. I ought not to mave any trouble getting that loan. Not but what I reckon the squire or Miss Mabel would let me have it, if I asked them."

He was almost home when he saw Henry Davenport coming toward him on horseback.

"Well, Jerry, off on an errand?" said the young man pleasantly.

"Yes, Mr. Davenport, By the way, is your father home these days?" went on Jerry.

"He is. But why do you sak?" questioned Henry Davenport, coming to a halt. "This morning of this feed to the him in the woods some time ago and stopped his runaway horse for him. Henry Davenport read the communication with much interest.

"Indeed! That is rather out of the ordinary, Jerry."

"It's on account of this letter. Do you know Mr. Henry Maxwell of New York?"

"Quite well."

"I met him in the woods some time ago and stopped his runaway horse for him. He asked me about myself and promised to try to find out something about me. This morning I got this letter."

Henry Davenport read the communication with much interest.

"I must congratulate you on your good fortune, Jerry!" he said warmly. "I trust you will be pleased with what is in store for you."

"Thank you. I wonder if I can't start for New York this afternoon."

"Better wait until tomorrow morning and then we can go together. It will be better for you to go with me than to go alone."

"Oh, Mr. Davenport, just the thing!" cried Jerry enthusiastically. "When are you going to start?"

"What did you do?"
"Gave him as good as he sent. I hope, after you have found that treasure, that you send him about his business."
"We'll certainly do that," answered Henry Davenport.
When Jerry reached home he took the letters to Squire Parkhurst and then told both the squire and Mabel about the communication from Mr. Maxwell.
"Jerry, I sincerely hope the news proves good," said Mabel. "But let me warn you not to raise said the boy.

There was nothing for him to do but to wait, and thinking he might assist Henry Davenport in the search for the Parkhurst treasure he hurried back to where he had left the young man.

"Why, yes, Jerry, you can go along to old Aunt Phœbe's house, if you wish," said Henry Davenport. "There may be quite some digging to do and you can help at that."

"It will just suit me," said the boy.

CHAPTER XXVIII. UNEARTHING THE TREASURE.

UNEAETHING THE TREASURE.

The little cottage occupied by Black Phœbe was situated at the extreme upper end of Manhattan Island, so far anove the then line of settlement that its value was regarded as merely nominal. It belonged to the Parkhurst estate, but the old family nurse had occupied it free of rent for years. On the land surrounding the cottage the aged colored woman raised a few vogetables. She also did such odd jobs as were offered to her, but she was getting too old to do a great deal.

When Henry Davenport rode up, accompanied by Jerry, the old woman yas at work just behind the house, hoeing potatoes. She was still vigorous, although she could not have been less than eighty years of age. Although it was midsummer, she wore a dress padded like a comforter of the present day. On her head she wore a white cloth that had been twisted into the form of a turban.

Jerry was introduced, and it was determined at once to proceed to dig for the treasure. As there were no houses near by, and it was not in sight from the road, this step was not considered imprudent. Stripping off his coat Henry Davenport proceeded to dig with energy, followed by Jerry. At length Jerry's spade struck a hard substance.

port proceeded to dig with energy, followed by Jerry. At length Jerry's spade struck a hard substance.

"Dat's it!" exclaimed Phœbe, clasping her arms. "Oh, for de love of Heaven, child, work as quick as you can."

Finding they were on the track, Henry Davenport and Jerry began to dig with greater energy than before, and at length revealed the top of a chest very strongly resembling those now used by sallors. Digging around it they discovered that it was bound up in heavy ropes, many of which had long since gone to decay.

"Let us try to lift the box out." said the young man in a slightly strained voice.

He was now tremendously excited, and so was Jerry. Using a spade and a block of wood, they pried up one end of the box and at last brought it up to the surface.

"Hadn't we better take it into the cottage?" suggested Jerry. "Somebody may come here while we are opening it."

"Yes, we'll take it in," said Henry Davenport. "Has yo' got a key fo' dat box?" demanded Black Phœbe.

"I have not; but it is much rotted, and I think it will break open with ease."

It was a heavy load to shift to the main room of the cottage. But neither the young man nor Jerry thought of the labor involved. To get the box open was their one thought.

At last it was in the cottage, and Black Phœbe shut the door and fastened it. Then, with a spade, Henry Davenport knocked off the top of the chest.

There, beneath the cover, lay a pile of gold,

CHAPTER XXIX.

AN OLD MYSTERY CLEARED UP. My young readers will well understand that Jerry was very anxious to see Mr. Henry Maxwell on the following day.

Half an hour before noon the boy and Henry Davenport set out for the home of the rich merchant.

Jerry was very anxious to see Mr. Henry Maxwell and hour before noon the boy and Henry Davenport set out for the home of the rich merchant.

"Let me caution you not to have too high hopes, Jerry," said the young man, for at least the tenth time. "After all, Mr. Maxwell may have made a mistake, or the news may not be as good as you anticipate."

To this Jerry did not answer. His heart was too full for speech.

When they reached the merchant's house they were invited into the parlor, and in a few minutes Henry Maxwell joined them.

"I am very glad to see you," he said, as he shook hands. "And also glad to see you, Mr. Davenport."

"I came just as soon as I could, Mr. Maxwell," said Jerry. "I am more than anxious to hear about what you have found out."

"Did you bring the overcoat and the slip of paper with you, Jerry?"

"Yes, sir."

"Very good, then. I presume they are in that bundle under your arm."

"The blue overcoat is, sir. The slip of paper is in my pocket."

"Will you let me see the paper?"

"Certainly, sir."

Jerry produced the slip and Henry Maxwell scanned it closely for a minute.

"It certainly looks like the same writing." he murmured to himself.

"Like what writing?" demanded Jerry, catching the words.

"Never mind now, Jerry. I wish you would come with me. I want you to pay a visit to an old woman who may know a good deal about your past. She was going to sail for Europe, but I managed to detain her in New York."

"Shall I go along?" questioned Henry Davenport. "I take a great interest in Jerry. He has just done the Parkhursts, and incidentally myself, a great service."

"The merchant called for his coach, and soon it came around to the front door and all three entered. It was a handsome affair, with soft toushions, and much better than Jerry had ever the requipage came to a standstill before a row of buildings that were in a highly dilapidated condition.

"Come in," said a somewhat hoarse voice, and the three entered.

The room was dirty in the extreme and contained furniture that had long ago seen its best days. There was one small window, which was open to admit the iresh air, and before this, in a rocker, sat an old woman, with whitish hair and wrinkled features. On the table was a can that had contained ale, and it was plainly to be seen that the woman was a hard drinker and had been for many years.

"So it's you, Mr. Maxwell," said the woman, in her rough voice. "I've been looking for you these three days."

"I had to go away on business," answered the merchant. He turned to Jerry, "Jerry, this is Mrs. Starfield. Mrs. Starfield, this is the boy I mentioned to you."

The woman turned to Jerry and gave him a sharp look. Then came a gasp and she held up her hands in astonishment.

"It is Maurice Robertson! It is Maurice Robertson come to life again!" she panted.

'You are sure of this?" demanded Mr. Maxwell.

"Yes, yes! Why sir, he is the dead image well.

"Yes, yes! Why sir, he is the dead image of his father! If you do not believe it, look at the portrait of Maurice Robertson which you will find in the old Robertson home in Concord."

"What is this you are saying?" asked Jerry.

"Who was Maurice Robertson?"

"He was your father," answered the woman.

"My father?"

"He was your father," answered the woman.

"My father?"

"Yes, and vou look exactly like him."

"Hold, not so fast," interrupted Henry Maxwel.

"Let us make certain first." He brought forth the blue overcoat. "Do you recognize this. Mrs. Starfield?"

"I do, sir. It is the very same that my husband wore on the day the child was stolen."

"And now this slip of paper." The merchant passed it over. "Look at it well, and let me know if you are prepared to swear that it is your handwriting."

Mrs. Starfield took the paper and held it to the light.

"Yes, I wrote that. I am sure of it."

Without replying, the merchant passed over a blank piece of paper and a pencil.

"Write that same line on this," he ordered. In a somewhat agitated manner the woman compiled. Then the two slips of paper were compared.

"It is certainly the same hand," said Henry Davenport. "Sue trembles a little now, but the formation of the letters is exactly the same. and so is that flourish on the capitals, Mr. Maxwell."

"1ou are right," replied Mr. Maxwell.

"But what does all this mean.

well."

"You are right," replied Mr. Maxwell.
"But what does all this mean, Mr. Maxwell?" demanded Jerry. "Tell me who I am, won't you?"

"I will, but first I will have to tell you a little story." answered the merchant. "This woman

"I will, but first I will have to tell you a little story," answered the merchant. "This woman here and her husband were once in the employ of a merchant who lived at Concord. Massachusetts, and did business in Boston. This merchant had one son, a little fellow christened Jeremiah. The woman was, so far as I am able to learn, a faithful servant, but the husband was a man of low degree and one very fond of liquor.

from the big cities by manufacturers, and they would not send it anyway. I know a woman who makes children's dresses for a New York firm, and she gets ninety cents for making a dozen dresses. I will mail you her address and you can write to her. This woman is very quick and expert, and with her daughter's assistance, working fifteen hours a day, they can make close on a dozen and a half dresses. They make about a dollar and thirty cents a day, but it is killing work. White slavery, and such work at such prices, is a disgrace to our land. But people want, and must have things cheap, and they get the articles out of the blood and sweat of their brothers and sisters. This woman has to carry her huge bundle of work back to the factory, and wait many long days before she can be paid.

I don't know what to suggest for your boy. He should, of course, be in school for two more years at least, but you, in your delicate health cannot support and educate him. The state ought, in my opinion, to help support and educate all fatherless children. Children should not be forced to suffer, and be deprived of the education we owe them, because death has robbed them of their parents. An educated child is an asset to any state, an uneducated one is of little use and often develops criminal tendencies. These matters will be attended to some day, but at present there is no graft for our politicians in passing legisation for poor children, and so you will have to wait. Millons will read your letter, and many will be able to make you helpful suggestions. Perhaps someone would be glad to educate that fine boy of yours.

Acre is a special Providence watching o'er the widow and orphan and God will not forget you, and I am sure He will show you a way out of your difficulties. Those who write Mrs. White will discover from her reply that she is above the average in education and refinement. She was averse to my publishing her letter, but as I can help her only through you, I prevailed on her to let me publish it. Tens of thousands in this br

For the information of those who have not been regular readers of Comfort, and others who are becoming interested in the Cousins' League for the first time, and are ignorant of its aim and objects, the following facts will be of interest:

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of Comfort's immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of Comfort's family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Though the older folks are admitted, the young folks will always be the first consideration, and Uncle Charlie will write his page with a view of entertaining our young people solely.

Those who wish to join our League can do so by subscribing to Comfort for one year or inducing some one else to subscribe, and sending us their subscription. No premiums will be given those sending in members for the League.

If you are already a subscriber you can join by renewing your subscription, or subscribing a year ahead. You can have the membership card and button sent to yourself and the Comfort to a friend, if you already take the paper. All who join the League will receive a button and a handsome certificate of membership, also Comfort for one year, and the privilege of having their names in the letter list.

How to become a full-fledged League member.

How to become a Member

How to become a Member

In order to become a full-fledged League member and procure a card and button, you must become a paid-in-advance Comport subscribtor by sending fifteen cents to the subscription department, for yourself, or renew your own subscriptions now. When you do this, send five cents extra, or twenty cents in all, and say that you wish to join Comport's League of Cousins.

The five cents additional pays your membership fee and for the League button and membership card engrossed with your own name and membership number. All previous League membership offers are hereby withdrawn and only those who strictly comply with our above offer will be admitted to membership. It costs but twenty cents to join the League, a League which promises to be the greatest society of young people on earth. Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could twenty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate, join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members, who desire a list of the cousins residing in their several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1442 Pacific St., Brocklyn, N. Y., our grand secretary. Some of the lists contain hundreds of names, so our secretary must have some trifling remuneration as she is devoting the whole of her time to this work.

Conducted by Katherine Booth

To be a member of the Club means that you have the privilege of writing me confidentially, any and every time you want about anything that troubles you in your personal appearance, and I'll tell you my way to overcome it. So many people write me about just such things that I can't reply through the mails, but I'll answer in these columns. Sign your letter with your full name, of course, but also tell me what initial or nom de plume to use in answering you, and you will find the answer under these initials. Of course all of this advice is intended to be given free for the good of all COMFORT subscribers, so in asking any questions you only have to be sure that your subscription is paid in advance; if it has expired or is about to expire you had batter inclose 15 cents to the Publisher for a renewal to COMFORT when you write—then you will not miss any of the Beauty Talks.

Talk on Complexion

O woman, however charming she may be in other respects, can ever be entirely satisfied with herself if she be afflicted with any eruption of the skin, however slight.

As this is rather important, I have decided to devote this article to telling you how to prevent or banish these unsightly conditions of the skin.

of the skin.

First of all we must put away from us all of the skin.

First of all we must put away from us all thoughts of alluring creams, salves, cosmetics, etc., and go right to the root of all our troubles. Pimples and blackheads are merely a manifestation of the unhealthful condition of the stomach and bowels. Uninteresting as it may seem, constipation and indigestion are the cause of most of our skin troubles and cannot be reached by external treatment to any great extent. Now in order to get rid of these unpleasant little visitors, we must first lay a good foundation by ridding the system of all impurities and promoting the proper circulation of the blood, and this is accomplished by a firm adherence to a simple form of diet, proper baths and lots of fresh air. That isn't very hard to do, I'm sure. Why not try living rightly and be rewarded by a clear smooth skin and a mind at peace with itself? Candies, pastries, etc., are very dear to the feminine heart, I am free to admit, but are they worth all the trouble and annoyance they bring in their train? I think not.

It is enough to give one the horrors to think of the things some

It is enough to give one the hor-rors to think of the things some women eat, and yet, when their skins lose their fresh, natural tints, and little blotches slowly (or rapid-skins lose their fresh, natural tints, and little blotches slowly (or rapidly) appear, as the case may be, they wonder why, and hasten to some great specialist in skin diseases, when all they need to do is to eat simply, bathe properly and walk two or three hours every day in the open air and everything will come right and they will live happily ever afterwards, as the fairy books say.

Now, girls, won't you put away from you all thoughts of rich ples and puddings, hot biscuits, pancakes and similar food, and your strong cup of coffee that you "just can't do without," and make up your minds to develop a liking for simpler things? After you one begin and see how rapidly the troublesome blotches and blackheads disappear, I'll wager my hopes of a new spring hat that the flesh pots of Egypt, as represented by sweets, your favorite dessert, etc., will be shorn of all their attractions. A skin free from all blemishes is within the reach of all of us and costs only a little time and patience. And think of the dainty frills and furbelows you can adorn yours self with out of the money that the skin specialist didn't get!

A very pleasant little fad has lately become epidemic in this country and is very efficacious as a purifier of the blood if taken persistently. The prescription is one quarter of a pound of the best table raisins, taken daily. They must be masticated carefully before swallowing. The seeds and the skins, are, of course, not eaten. This is certainly a very pleasant treatment and one well worth trying. I also understand it adds weight rapidly, which is something it would be well to remember.

The belles of the old Colonial days had many simple methods for cleansing the blood of all I the rate to store the same and the many simple methods for cleansing the blood of all

The belles of the old Colonial days had many

The belles of the old Colonial days had many simple methods for cleansing the blood of all impurities, and the most remarkable results were obtained by the use of these old-fashioned remedies. A tea made of red clover tops was then considered to be a wonderfully curative agent in cases of slight skin troubles, and as no women in the world were ever so careful of their looks as these sprightly damsels of yore, it would not be well to disdain this simple beauty recipe. You will find it not only effective but delightful to the taste.

I wish to impress upon your memory that pimples and blackheads must not be irritated. So many people make the mistake of bruising or breaking the pimple under the erroneous impression that they are improving conditions, in which they are much mistaken, as they are simply spreading the inflammation. There are many external remedies to lessen this unsightly condition of the skin, among the foremost of which I class my Beauty bags. These Beauty bags have a healing effect upon skin disorders, and should be used three or four times a day. If you do this you will notice an immediate improvement. A good lotion for allaying inflammation of the skin is made by putting a solution of boracic acid in boiling water and using while warm. Listerine, eau de cologne and witch-hazel are also used for the same purpose and are considered good.

The application of any of these remedies for unhappy damsel, who I hope will see this article and start a crusade against them on her own account.

Blackheads

In cases where there are both pimples and blackheads, the former must be gotten rid of first, and when your skin is perfectly free from eruptions, it is time to take up the question of blackheads, which is done by giving your face a thorough scrubbing every night before retiring with a good complexion brush and warm water. It would be best to add a little alcohol to the bathing water if your blackheads are very bad. Alcohol, while very cleansing, also has the effect of drying the skin, giving it a parched appearance which can be easily remedied by rubbing in a little cold cream immediately after you have dried your face. For those who use soap, a word of caution. Avoid cheap, scented soap! Instead, try to get pure imported Castile, as it contains no injurious ingredients. Be sure to rinse all soap off your imported Castile, as it contains no injurious ingredients. Be sure to rinse all soap off your face with warm water before drying and applying cream, as otherwise your skin will be rough, scaly and darkened in color.

While you are holding this house-cleaning session it may seem to you that you are simply making a bad matter worse, as for a number of days your pores will seem larger, coarser and more open, but this is only a phase, and you eventually will be the proud possessor of a skin free from all blemishes.

If your blackheads are large and

If your blackheads are large and stubborn, you might remove them by the use of a little instrument called a comedone extractor, which I think only costs seventy-five cents. For myself, however, I would prefer property in the black.

and grime.

Many a poor complexion comes from neglecting the proper cleansing methods. Please don't forget this and save yourself much annoyance and trouble.

A few words about freckles will not come amiss, as about one half of feminine humanity seems to be afflicted with these little marks. For the comfort of those unhappy ones, I can say that only women with thin, delicate skins ever have these blemishes, and the more fine and delicate the skin is, the more subject it is to this freckling habit.

In order to scatter the freckles, the outside layer must be removed, as freckles lie below

In order to scatter the freckles, the outside layer must be removed, as freckles lie below the skin. A good home remedy is lemon juice and glycerine. For those who do not feel that they can use glycerine, I would suggest diluting it with water until it is mild enough to use. Pure glycerine is a great irritant to most people. The above mixture is extremely beneficial. You must use equal proportions of lemon juice and glycerine.

A simple lotion for freckles and one that has been used with great success, is composed of one dram of ammonium chloride to four ounces of distilled water. Apply this lotion at night and after the face has been bathed in hot water.

So many have asked for directions for making the Beauty Bags that I am printing them here this month:

Directions for Making Pretty Girls' Club Beauty Bags.

Take ordinary cheesecloth and cut it into strips two and a half inches wide by five inches long, fold over and sew up the sides making nice little bags about two and a half inches square, fill these with Quaker Oats and sew up the top of the bag and you have one of the most wonderful little healthful cleansers for the skin ever devised; they have such a healing effect upon skin disorders you will notice an immediate improvement if used as per following directions. Every night on going to bed fill a basin full of warm water and allow the bag to soak for a few seconds, not long, just till you see a little milky substance begin to ooze forth. Then using the bag as a wash cloth, thoroughly rub the face—every little crevice and wrinkle (later we'll get rid of crevices and wrinkles). Keep moistening the bag just as you would a wash cloth. The result will surprise you. It has a wonderful cleansing effect and removes all roughness and all scaly bits of skin leaving the face smooth and soft and clean. (You don't realize how much the latter means, but half of us aren't clean, even when we think so). In the daytime, if for any reason your face feels rough and dry, use the "Beauty Bag" again. One of the most delightful presents I know of for a pretty girl is a box of Beauty Bags, all daintily overcast or buttonholed with wash silk in delicate colors.

In the October issue I will answer some of OULTING, clean, draught-proof house, and judiciously selected food are the principal factors in getting winter eggs, and September is the month in which the fundamental month in which the fundamental in the fall it is impossible to get them into condition before the really cold weather, for the growth of new feathers requires so much oil that there is none left to provide animal heat, so the food which should be converted into eggs has to furnish the warmth necessary to keep the bird alive.

After many experiments, it has been generally conceded that by withholding food entirely for three weeks, and then feeding heavily rations suitable for the formation of feathers, the moulting season can be controlled. The last week of August mature hens are turned out on free range to forage for their own living. About the end of the second week in September, flocks are returned to their respective yards, roosters being kept in a separate enclosure until the breeding pens are made up in January.

Feed a morning mash of equal parts, wheat bran, ground feed, and oil-meal. Noon: Meat scraps, vegetables, or some sort of green. Night: Wheat, corn, and oats mixed. The first few days give only half meals, as the excessive heavy feed might cause indigestion after the semi-starvation. By the 10th of October the birds should be in possession of full new coats of feathers and robust health. Three weeks after reyarding change the diet to regular egg rations.

The chicken-house is, unfortunately, a dark, dilapidated place on most general farms, needing thorough renovating. Commence by having the old roosting poles and nests torn out and burned at once. Do not let them be left lying about. Ceining and sides must be swept with a stiff broom: corners, ledges, all crevices well scraped off, the surface carted to a remote part of the farm, and scattered broadcast. It is excellent fertilizer for the garden: but as the previous occupants of the chicken-house may not have been healthy, it is safer not to leave it where your birds can scratch in floor; shut the door and leave the place alone for twelve hours.

Unless it is an exceptionally well-built house, the outside will have to be covered over with two-ply tar paper. When calculating the quantity required remember that the dealer's quotation of feet in a roll, is of square, not running feet; therefore a roll of two hundred and fifty feet of the usual yard width would only be about eight-two lineal feet.

and fifty feet of the usual yard width would only be about eight-two lineal feet.

Choose a dry day without frost; start at the bottom, using the caps and nails which are specially made for the purpose; some makers send out sufficient for er h roll and include it in the prices quoted. Each row must be allowed to lap over the edge of the preceding one, two inches. Fit up snugly under the eaves of the roof, or, if it is even with a sides, allow ample overlappings; otherwise slanting, beating rains will find a vulnerable spot and cause trouble. Whatever the size of the building, have the greater part of the south or southwest exposure, glass. Ordinary-sized sashes can be bought in or near every village, and are best fixed in grooves top and bottom, because then the whole sash can be pushed back and out of the way on fine days. On the outside, cover the opening with wire netting.

After the exterior of the poultry-house is put into good repair, the interior must be considered.

If the floor appears damp, have a thick layer of stones laid over it before felling.

considered.

If the floor appears damp, have a thick layer of stones laid over it before filling in clean earth in place of the surface scraped away. It must be leveled and well stamped down; when finished, the floor must be a foot above the outer ground.

Half a small cup of crude carbolic acid and a similar-sized cup of kerosene stirred into whitewash applied hot to the walls and ceiling of the chicken-house, makes it wholesomely clean. When this is done, have a platform three feet wide run across the back, or end, of the house, two feet from the floor.

Get hardwood slats four inches wide by two inches thick; from these construct a frame

Get hardwood slats four inches wide by two inches thick; from these construct a frame eighteen inches wide and six inches shorter than the length of the platform. At each corner of this frame put a nine-inch leg. This frame when stood upon the platform, makes two roosts which, being on the same level, prevents the birds fighting and crowding upon one another, as they always do when the roosts slant, each bird desiring to be on the too rung.

top rung.

If the house is to accommodate twelve hens, If the house is to accommodate twelve hens, provide six nests a foot square, made in groups of three, with legs a foot high; they are easily handled and removed for house-cleaning. Stand them in the darkest and most secluded part of the house. Put a handful of hay and a china nest-egg in each. Scatter dry sand, earth, fine ashes, or sawdust on the platform, to prevent the droppings from adhering to the boards; it facilitates cleaning. The entire floor space is finally to be covered five or six inches deep with straw cut a foot in length, common bedding hay, or dried leaves.

The yard is best in front of the house. Straight poles about seven inches in circumference and eight feet long, cut from the woods, or four-by-four spruce scantling, inserted two feet in the ground and six feet apart, constitute the foundation on which to stretch the wire netting. Make a door into the yard, using very light poles or slats for the foundation, and, of course, covering it with wire. Run a baseboard from post to post, and above it two-inch mesh galvanized wire netting, five feet wide. Yards for a house accommodating twelve birds should be at least fifty feet long and ten feet wide.

If time or the restriction on expenditure prohibits the platform, nests, etc., they can be dispensed with for a time by standing the roosting frame on the floor, taking the precaution to have plenty of the scratching material under it; empty grocery boxes can be substituted for the made nests. Nail the netting as low down on the posts as possible, if baseboards are not used, and throw earth all around the outside. Even the roosting frame could be made from straight saplings.

Scratching materials and green food should now be thought of, or else they will go short in the winter and the egg crop will diminish. Dandelion, plantain, chickweed, and all green things, gathered and packed into barrels with a board fitted tightly to the inside on which a heavy weight is placed, will remain in a fresh, succulent condition far into the cold season. This will save expense, materially increase the egg yield, and insure fertility. Ferns and weeds, cut now and dried, will enable you to be generous with litter during the cold months.

E. J. L.—I have been losing my hens; one every few days. They droop for a few days; combs pale; at last have something like a fit, and in a moment fall over dead. I opened one and found its liver greatly enlarged; in fact, the entire liver appeared like a large clot of blood. The hens are fat and have laid well all through the winter and spring. They are B. P. R.'s; have free range, with a little Kaffir corn night and morning.

A.—You say the hens have free range and only a little Kaffir corn night and morning, but I think that their rations have been much heavier during the winter and early spring, for you also say "they laid well"—"and are fat." I should judge you feed heavily during the winter; probably used some highly-seasoned "egg food." The results of over-feeding is often not noticeable until long afterwards. Being now on free range they will recover without any doctoring, but be careful to get them into good condition before cold weath or the heavy feed necessary in the winter will bring back the trouble. Let them find their own food for a few weeks, and twice a week put one teaspoonful of sulphate of magnesia into every quart of drinking water until October, then give one fourth of a teaspoonful of Nux Vomica in every pint of drinking water, twice a week for three weeks.

J. C. Y.—I had two Silver Penciled Wyandotte pullets and a cockerel. I set three hens and hatched four chicks. Then I sent and got a two-year-old rooster and set two hens, which hatched one chick. The eggs were not over four-teen days old, and when I broke them they looked as if they were half-cooked, and did not smell rotten. There were 15 eggs under each hen; a total of 75 eggs and only five chicks.

A.—You do not say how long you had the two-year-old rooster before setting the last two hens. It would take at least ten days and probably as long again before his influence affected the eggs. I do not care to use eggs for hatching when more than five days old. Were they kept in a cool place and turned every day? Please let me know if you have had any better success since.

since.

J. S. J.—(2) How will cut green grass do to feed young chicks?—cut up fine with their other food. (3) Can you tell me where I can get eggs from Black and White Dorkings?

A.—Your first question is being answered by mail. (2) Grass would do; clover would be better; green tops of onions and lettuce leaves still better. (3) I know no one who keeps Dorkings. If any of our readers breed them and will send me their addresses, I will gladly forward them to you. (The person who desires to get eggs lives in Obio.)

W. S.—Can you help me? I have written them to you. (The person who desires to get eggs lives in Ohio.)

W. S.—Can you help me? I have written to the poultry paper we take and their answer is not satisfactory. I have had several pullets and cockerels go blind. Their appearance does not indicate anything wrong. Their eyes are open most of the time, but when they walk they run into anything that happens to be in the way. They have trouble to find food, though when they get started on a pile they eat some. They got so weak it seemed best to kill them. On dissecting we found the inside lining of the gizzard to be loose from the outer wall, and had several sores on it. They are Leghorns and have unlimited range. Have been fed on cornmash and sunflower seed.

A.—I must own that I don't know what is the trouble, but should fear poison of some sort had caused it; the blindness being the result of the inflammation of the intestines. Has there been any quick-lime, paint, chemical fertilizer, or such material left about the place? All I can suggest is to yard the birds and give them milk to drink. Do you use much washing-powder and throw the water where the chickens can get at it to drink? It must be something of that sort.

Everton could not help feeling cowed. He drew a card from his pocket.

Ralph glanced at the card and started.

"You know the name, I see," said Everton.

"It is a well-known one," said the young foreman. "I can scarcely believe that you have disgraced it."

"I have not, sir."

And Everton repeated the explanation that he had made to Dave and Madge.

"But," said Ralph, "how did you happen to be inquiring for Miss Mason?"

This time the millionaire was ready with an answer; he had thought up a story.

"The explanation is very simple," he said. I said to be a news-girl, and her face was familiar to hundreds of business men and women."

For a few moments Madge did not reply. She pressed her hand to her forehead and seemd to be buried in deep thought. Then she said:
"I know now where I've heard dat name! It was from me mudder's lips."

And tears filled the girl's eyes.
"From your mother?" exclaimed Ralph.

Mrs. Bertha Chipps, Vermontville, Michigan.

Dear Mrs. Wilkinson and Sisters:

I have been a reader of "Comfort" for a long time and of late, a subscriber. I am also a member of "C. L. O. C." I, too, must say "Comfort" is an ideal magazine, full of interesting literature from cover to cover.

I will endeavor to describe myself: I am a born and bred Kentuckian, am twenty-four years old, have blue eyes, brown hair, light complexion, small for my age, weight, one hundred and thirty-three pounds. I love outdoors sports and sunshine, nature's best tonic.

I will tell the sisters how I keep my "Comforts," I have sheet-music folios, and every month when a new number comes I place it in the folio, they can be placed in rotation and read without being taken out, and instead of clipping out recipes and mutilating my "Comforts," I have a blank book that I write in ink, every tested recipe that comes to my notice, and besides cooking recipes I have "items" of all kinds and it is very valuable to me.

Did any of the sisters every try the "Emergency Box?" It sounds funny and odd, but if tried, it will prove a great idea, to start one. You must put in a bank or box all the stray pennies left from purchases and to add every economic move and self-denial act and you will be surprised to see how it will furnish assistance at certain times when there is a "draw" on the "bank or Emergency Box."

I would be delighted to hear from any of the sisters, who care to write. Wishing success to "Comfort" and with sympathy extended to all the "shut-ins" I am.

Dear Comfort Readers:

I have taken Comfort nearly two years and I eagerly await its coming each month.

I have lived in Michigan since I was married and that was two years last June; before that my home was in sunshiny Santa Fe, New Mexico. The natives of New Mexico speak the Spanish language among themselves. It is a pretty soft sounding tongue and very easily learned.

The buildings are mostly made of dried mud bricks, called adobe (pronounced adoby). The poor people have flat dirt roofs and hard dirt floors, but many adobe houses have tin or shingle roofs, are plastered on the outside to look like stone or brick

MY DEAR SISTERS:

I have been a reader of our little paper over two years, and have made up my mind I want to be a "Comfort Sister."

A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

Draining a Cistern

N any yard that has sewerage and an outside slop sink a quick and almost magical way of draining a cistern is by the much understood but little utilized siphon principle. It matters not how far the cistern and sink or vault are apart, or what intervenes between them, the only thing necessary is to have the outlet of the rubber hose or other tube lower than the inlet. To start the flow is the trick that not one out of a hundred can do. The way to go about it is to first fill the hose with water, thus exhausting the air out of it, then while one person drops the lower end into the vault another inserts the intaking end into a full pail of water and quickly lowers pail and all into the cistern. This half minute's work is all that is needed, and the flow thus started will continue until the cistern is entirely drained. To a bright, active boy this idea is worth many crisp dollars.

A Strange Fact

What is it that warms the air? I fancy I can What is it that warms the air? I fancy I can hear thousands of COMFORT boys answer, "Why the sun, of course." Now this is not so, the sun does not warm the air. The earth, by giving off its own heat performs that service. It, of course, is heated by the sun, but there must be something to stop the rays before heat can be produced. It is a very strange fact that heat can pass through a body without affecting it in the least. A gigantic illustration of this is the sun itself, we know that if we travel towards it, increasing cold is encountered. A simple way to prove it is to use a globe of ice for a burning glass. The heat passing through it will ignite cloth yet it does not melt the ice.

Marble Trick

For this trick you need about a dozen mar-bles and a block of wood or other material with a long groove into which the marbles fit. Place six or seven in the groove touching each other, and tell the company that you can by striking the right end "a" knock as many off the left end "b" as you wish. If someone asks you to knock off three all you have to do is to place three more marbles in the groove a few inches away from the others, and with a sharp blow of the thumb start them rolling toward the latter. When they strike three will separate themselves from the row off the end opposite to that which is struck. The rule is this. Whatever number of marbles strike the row a like number will be detached from the other end. You can try the same trick with a row of pennies on a flat, smooth table top, but you will not get as good results as from the marbles and groove.

Paint Brushes

A paint brush properly cared for will give good service until it is worn close to the handle, while one upon which the paint is permitted to dry and harden is practically destroyed. Before using a new paint brush or one that has been lying idle you should soak it in warm water for about an hour. This causes the wood to expand, tightens its hold on the bristles and prevents their falling out. When you finish painting cleanse the brush by immersing it in turpentine, dry it thoroughly, wrap in clean paper, and place on a shelf. You need not waste the turpentine used; if the vessel that contains it is sealed, the sediment of paint will settle to the bottom, you can then draw it off and use it for any you can then draw it off and use it for any

Tool Rack

One of the most creditable things a farmer's One of the most creditable things a farmer's son can give his time to is the making of this tool rack. At a glance you can see that it is simple, useful and practical in a high degree. It is shaped a good deal like a common saw horse, and should be made of scantling or heavy plank. The ends, as shown in Fig. 1, are shaped like inverted "V's" and are connected with long strips like the rungs of a ladder. In the top scantling spikes are driven for the tools to hang from, and on the bottom an extending hang from, and on the bottom an extending piece or shelf is placed for them to rest on. Under and between the side parts a wide flat board is nailed by means of two end cleats, as in Fig. 2. This latter serves for a shelf for small tools, boxes of nails, rivets, screws, etc. For a lad who has the use of a large dry barn this rack is handier and more accessible than a or shelf is placed for them to rest on

Liquid Glue

If you are fond of making things, especially of wood you will welcome this recipe for liquid glue. Dissolve an ounce of borax in a pint of boiling water and pour this mixture into a pint of shellac, stirring it gently until the shellac is melted. Then bottle and keep tightly sealed. This glue will not harden unless exposed to the air and is applied by brushing on with a small camel's-hair brush. It is very valuable to anyone who does small care very valuable to anyone who does small car-penter work, cabinet making, picture framing,

Multiplying by 9's

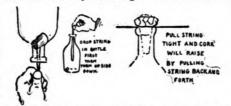

To multiply by 9, 99 or any number of 9's, annex as many ciphers to the multiplicand as there are 9's in the multiplier, and from the result subtract the multiplicand. This makes the work far shorter and simpler as shown in the example.

Example: Multiply 2736 by 999 equals 2736000

It is a good plan to cut out those rules that have been appearing in the Boys' Corner and paste them in a scrapbook or in the back of your arithmetic. Practice them a little every your arithmetic. Practice them a little every day and you will soon have a fund of mathematical knowledge that will place you far above the average boy of your age. In banks and other places of business rapid calculators receive yeary large wages. receive very large wages.

Cork in Bottle

To get a cork out of a bottle form a piece of tough cord into a loop and lower it down through the neck. Have the cork on the bottom of the bottle with the tapering part up, and by a little maneuvering you can get the loop under it. Raise it slowly till it is fast in the neck, then jerk it out. A glass stopper is best removed by twisting a cord around it, then grasping each end of the cord and drawing rapidly back and forth. This heats the stopper and causes it to contract.

How many are interested in Physical Culture? I am for one, and here is a good exercise for strengthening the back, and the muscles of the abdomen. Lie face down on the floor with the hands each side of the shoulders, then slowly raise the thorax as high as possible not moving the limbs, inhaling when you go up and exhaling when you lie back, try it. What it has done for me it will do for you.

If any of the sisters have the song entitled "Only a Little Brook after All," and will send it to me I will return favor in any way I can. I have an organ and am very fond of music.

Dear Editor:

May I ask for an introduction to the Sisters'
Corner? Being a new subscriber I should like to know you all a little better.

I am a New Yorker, but have left the city because of ill health. I live on the famous Merrick Road; it is a beautiful spot, though I lived all my live in the city till one year ago I do not get lonely. I enjoy reading Comfort more than I can say, and the letters from the different sisters. I should like to live on a farm. I have read what the sisters have written over and over and gained much information from them. I hope these few suggestions will meet with your approval. How to make a workbag and apron combined.

Cut a circle as large in circumference as a yard of dimity will permit and roll the edge, trimming with lace edging two and one half inches wide. Sew small brass rings on the inside of the circle about three inches from the edge and run double drawing strings through these rings of ribbon, run ribbons in opposite directions through rings, make them as long as your circle is round, finish at the end with small bows. When drawn up this forms a dainty workbag for knitting or a large piece of embroidery and when opened it entirely covers the dress, keeping the work rresh and clean.

A good footstool can be made from an ordinary cheese box by covering inside and outside with cretonne, adjusting the cover with hinges so that it can be opened and closed; it then can be used as a hat box, it is serviceable as well as ornamental.

In the city one appreciates a bit of green; the most of the sisters have farms and gardens and would not bother with a hanging garden but it might be someone would like to try it.

Take a good-sized sponge and sow it full of rice, oats or wheat placing it for a week or ten days in a shallow dish containing water.

The sponge will absorb the moisture and the seeds will begin to sprout before many days.

When this has taken place suspend it by a cord from a hook at the top of the window where it will get a little sun, it will become a mass of green and require little moisture.

I should like to hear from any of the sisters who would write.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:
Surely our paper is rightly named, "Comfort,"
I glean comfort and information each month from its visit. I have often longed to join the band of sisters, but felt I could bring such a tiny mite of information I hesitated to ask for admission.

Our house and contents were destroyed by fire April 20, from which we narrowly escaped.

Some of the sisters I know have had a similar experience. And sometimes it takes misfortune for us to realize how much love and kindness is among us in the hearts of our fellowmen. Sisters, the world is full of kindness; let's hunt it ever and add our mite.

Try rubbing your lamp chimneys out with a dry cloth every morning.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Nearly two years ago I wrote a letter to this corner. I felt at home when writing to COMFORT, asking the readers of COMFORT to give me a letter party and it was a grand success. I received nearly one hundred letters. I am very thankful to all who wrote me. I have gained several dear friends through the paper.

I still live on a farm and like farm life. I raise a great many chickens. We own our farm and have a good orchard. This is a mountainous country, very rocky in most places, still there are many good farms almost free from rocks. It is a good a untry for small fruits of all kinds and vegetables. Plenty of timber and good clear water, pure air and very moderate climate. Cotton is raised abundantly in the southern part of the state, while corn, oats, hay and vegetables are our chief crops here.

Why don't the farmers of this good old state make up and write and give us a good hand shake or howd'y'do, so we will know you are living enjoying this comer?

Mrs. Ward. Write us more of your island home. Like most of the sisters I would be lonesome many a time if it were not for my little folks.

If any of the readers have calico or gingham scraps to spare I could make use of them. Thanking all the dear sisters for their kind letters, with best wishes, I remain.

Mrs. E. A. Underhill, Solo, Ark.

Dear Comfort Sisters:

Perhass a short letter from "Dixie" land may of "The Sunny South," and wonder why it is, I am not a "native," for I came here from Minn. nearly six years ago, but I can truthfully say that I like Florida and anyone who would not be delighted with the climate here, would be hard to suit. Dear old Minn, is all right (except the awful cold weather), but nothing could induce me to again make my home in that land of ice and snow, where—to quote from a correspondent—"one has to wait eight months of the year for the other four to come." Such a winter as this last one was in the North! Snow and sleet on the 11th of May, and no signs of "letting up." About two weeks ago I read in a Northern newspaper: "There is not a warm place to be found on the map." That certainly was news. I imagine if the editor could have been set down in Florida about that time, he would have changed his tune in a hurry. Just at the present (May), the orange trees, or groves, are a signt to be remembered, to my mind, a grove in bloom is even a grander sight than when loaded with great golden balls, though some might think differently, it is beautiful either way. The Magnolia trees, too, I cannot describe them, but a person who has never seen one in blossom has missed a great treat. The gardens here are pretty, nearly every home in both town and country has their wealth of flowers, not for a few weeks but all the year. Of course old Jack Frost makes a short visit once or twice during the winter, and gives a little nip here and there, but in a few weeks you would never know it. Orchards are used for hedges and grow into large trees, the flowers, at a little distance might be thought to be roses. Another favorite flower is the Crape Myrtle. Pink, red and purple, they occupy the same place here that our lilacs in the North, do there. There are hundreds of other beautiful flowers and vines, but I am afraid Mrs. Wilkinson will scold me if I take up any more of her time, so I will close. I will send my favorite "fruit" cake recipe for the "family" to try.

Gene Marfield asks himself why a woman of Mrs. Rösslyn's Puritanic strength of character should embrace the Catholic faith. feared to speak and admit his wrong position lest he, too, would break down.

Warfield remained silent, slow tears gathering, then overflowing in sympathy with the sobbing heart of a loving woman deprived by nature of motherhood.

It was the day following the election. Warfield along one back to the West and had stood for re-election. He had taken the stump and discussed the questions of the hour. Corcoran had quietly, but not openly, opposed him. Money had done its work. The great political fund of the Trust was used to the best advantage. Newspapers, which had sung his praises while he obeyed the dictates of the corporations, turned against him after his memorable speech in Congress. They had defiled him, both politically and personally. And nov it was over. His constituents did not believe him: they feared to trust his honesty and the defeat had been decisive. Warfield knew his opponent had made before his election; but the people did not know. He cared nothing for the allusions to his private life. What he had made before his election; but the people did not know. He cared nothing for the allusions to his private life. What he had done satisfied his conscience, but the death of his boy was a sacred thing. It had nearly broken his heart. When Mrs. Blodgett touched this subject all his reserve strength was swept away in the torrents of suppressed grief.

The judge arose, walked over to his weeping wife, touched her gently upon her gray locks, hastily drew on his coat and hat and went out. After a time the bird in its cage by the window began to chip, then as the sun burst from the clouds throwing its rays in autumnal splendor upon the window, the inspiration was caught up in rapturous song.

Warfield recovered first. Dashing back the unbidden tears he turned his attention to the songster.

"Dickey, I wonder if you ever long to be free! You sing beautifully but I believe something out of my system, and I want to do something out of my system, and I want to get something out of my system, and I want to get some

The bird sang on. Mrs. Blodgett had regained control of herself and was busily removing the dishes used for the morning meal.

"Mr. Warfield—Gene—you don't mind my calling you Gene, 'cause I am old enough to be your mother, I shall never forgive your wife. You never had her love and you are better without her, but that little grave in the village cemetery just out of Washington—he was such a sweet child, and how I could have loved him—just as my own——"

And the net storm broke again and the tears flowed afresh. In a little while Warfield, spoke.

so many times in his day dreams. Several times on the way he stopped to address old acquaintances, and, although no one recognized him until he had spoken, his heart was gladdened by the cordial welcome he received.

"All here is the same—I alone have changed," he said to himself. But this thought, while it brought a strain of sadness, did not detract from the joy of his home coming. As ne reached the lane leading up to the Catholic Church, an uncontrollable desire impelled him to stand once more beneath the old tree where he and Theta had parted so long ago, and climbing the hill he saw that someone had recently passed that way, for there in the soft snow lay the imprints of slender arched feet. The blood beat strangely in his veins and a joy so keen as almost to stop the pulsation of his heart swent over him.

"Who but Theta would visit this spot?" he thought. "And if she comes here still, she surely cannot have forgotten the past." Gaining the crest of the hill, he stood for some moments gazing out across the valley. The air had in it the sharp bite of winter but the declining sun shone brightly in a sky of cloudless blue. As on that day so long ago the shadow of the cross stretched darkly to Warfield's feet, and one of his old musing moods being strong upon him, he addressed it as though it had been some animate thing.

"Black cross, between us two there was once a contest in which you came off victor. Have I but come back to renew the fight? and which shall conquer, now? Today I stand here a free man—free in the sight of the law from the woman who bore my name—but will Theta recognize that fact? Is there not some common plane where we can meet and be happy? Can it have been only a dream that I heard my darling cry out to me and fall with a face like death at the foot of this tree? Ah! how I have been only a dream that I heard my form the woman who ber my name—but will Theta recognize that fact? Is there not some common plane where we can meet and be happy? Can it have been only a dream that I heard my fert

"She probably tucked that into her bodice," and the place where her skirt had brushed the snow.

"She probably tucked that into her bodice," he thought.

Drawing ever nearer to his quarry he passed through the feathery snow, at length to find himself in a grove of monster pines. There was something cathedral like in the place, the long columns lifting in grandeur to the arches of the clouds and the wind murmuring softly here and there like whispering acolytes.

Then suddenly he saw her.

She was standing on a little knoll in the midst of the grove, her slender figure poised as if on wings, all the awe and mystery of the forest in her wide dark eyes.

Warfield stood speechless. He saw the pure contour of her cheeks with their wild-rose bloom, the lovely red mouth in dazzling contrast to her white skin and the waving hair like a cloud of spun light above her pure brow, and all his being trembled. He, the man of strength and will who had passed through the flame of temptation and come out hardened as the iron, trembled now before the presence of one frail girl standing alone in the ancient wood. The love which had lived through all the years of separation awoke at the sight of her. A strong sense of his own unworthiness came over him.

"Dear Soul!" he cried softly to himself, like one in pain. "She is pure as the snow about her. What have I to do with such as she—I, with the soil and grime of the world upon me?" Yet never had the need of his heart demanded her as it did now. He wanted to speak to her, to touch her hand, and the mere thought that he was free by the law to do this choked him and made him weak.

Presently she started, her hand leaped to her breast, her lips parted and her breath quickened as her aves caught his and rested thought that he was free by the law to do this choked him and made him weak.

Presently she started, her hand leaped to her breast, her lips parted and her breath quickened as her eyes caught his and rested.

Gene remained motionless. The desire, the yearning, the long years of ceaseless struggle, the thirst for love—all flamed in his eyes and fixed their gaze in a speechless ardor. So for long, long minutes the duel of their glances lasted—his masterful, passionate; hers tender yet aloof, half proud. Then the mastery of his look prevailed and she took a quick step forward and held out both hands.

"It is you! Or am I dreaming? And yet—took a quick step forward and held out both hands.

"It is you! Or am I dreaming? And yet—how changed!" She half lifted one little hand as if to touch the whitened locks on his temples, then a sudden remembrance came to her of the woman he had married and she stiffened a little and drew back, the hand dropping to her side. In the depths of her soul what woman ever quite forgave a man for having forgotten her for another?

As Gene looked down at the sweet flower-like face and drooping, half parted lips, a torrent of the old feeling came over him and he longed to crush her slender body to his breast; to press his lips to hers until she cried out with the pain of it, yet, so great was his sense of humility he wished to throw himself down in the snow at her feet. He was no longer an impetuous youth, and he had learned to curb his emotions, but he did none of these things, merely taking in his, her little hand, his eyes alone speaking a language his lips dared not utter.

"Yes, Theta." he said softly. "I have utter.

"Yes, Theta," he said softly, "I have changed. So, too, have you, but it is only that you have grown more beautiful."

She blushed again under his ardent look but

She blushed again under his ardent look but made no reply, and soon they found themselves walking through the wood in a silence more potent than speech. It seemed to Gene the strangest and yet most natural thing in the world they should be walking there, side by side. Every now and then he stole a glance at the lovely face framed in the becoming hood.

"The years that have left such an indelible impress upon me—how lightly have they touched her!"

impress upon me—how lightly have they touched her!"

Theta was thinking of the manner in which Gene had tracked her through the snow.

"How foolish of me; that today of all days I should have come this way! Will he think because I visit the old tree I still cherish a love for him?" she thought half angrily, while the hot blood mounted to her face. "And why should he seek the place when he has not yet even been home to see his mother? He forgot me for the other. How the thought has tortured me! And yet, he, too, has suffered. A mere political defeat would not have brought the worn and world-weary look into his face—there must have been months of cruel suffering occasioned by the parting from his beautiful wife. He must have loved her else he would not have changed so sadly! How I long to comfort him! Yet how I suffer! I must not be too tender else he will think I still love him, and yet I must be sympathetic lest he think me cold. Poor Gene—it is only right I should be kind to him." Some of the thoughts in Theta's mind found utterance as she broke the silence by asking softly:

"Have you heard nothing from your wife, Gene? Was there no chance for a reconciliation?"

He looked gravely down at her.

Gene?

tion?"

He looked gravely down at her.

"I have neard nothing from her since the day we each received a decree of divorce. There wasn't any chance for a reconciliation. You see, Theta, she never loved me, and she found a man she did love." A spasm of pain contracted his lips and a sorrowful light came into his eyes as he spoke. He was thinking of his child. But Theta interpreted differently.

ently.

"How he must love her, for the mere mention of her name brings a stricken look into his face."

"It was noble of you—giving up your beautiful wife—as Ruskin gave up his."

He stooped to lift a bough obstructing the path before anyworing

"It was noble of you—giving up your beautiful wife—as Ruskin gave up his."

He stooped to lift a bough obstructing the path before answering.

"It was not a matter of my sensibilities. Theta, it was a question of right. Women ought to be the equal of men, not by degrading but by elevating them—not by fettering but by unshackling them. My wife had the right to the control of her own personality—it was not for me to hold her against her will."

"But Gene," Theta cried in astonishment, "where are all your old creeds and beliefs? You who believed so strongly in the power of the strongest, in the doctrine of the survival of the fittest—were you not strong enough to hold one woman?" She stopped short, crimsoning as she remembered his powerlessness to hold herself so long ago.

He smiled a little at her questioning.

"My old creeds and beliefs? I have thrown them away, as one casts aside an outworn garment. And the god that once I worshiped. Ambition, I cry unto no longer. Ah! Theta," he went on, as he drew in a long draught of the strong aromatic odor of the pines; "all that had any value in life I gave up when I left these woodland solitudes. My early, happy, boyhood years were the only ones worth living." There was a touching sadness in his tone. But in Theta's soul a bitterness welled up. He to speak of sacrifice and ranunciation! Had not all happiness for her, too, ended with her childhood? In spite of the suffering so plainly written in his face, he, at least had trodden the path of success, and honors had been heaped upon him. For her had remained the stony way of adversity, and while it had steeled her character, it had also robbed her of many of the joys of youth.

Gene seemed to read these thoughts in her face, as he turned to push aside a dead limb which would have brushed against her.

"You think I have no reason to complain, Theta? You believe I have had an enviable existence? You little realize how barren and comfortless it has been." He broke off suddenly as the bitter memory came back to him.

Theta dr

Theta drew nearer and looked up sympathetas opposite as the poles."

"But, Gene, are you quite sure you have done right in setting your wife free? The Church has always taught no man can h. ve more than one wife and no woman more than one husband, and that the marriage bond, once validly formed, can be dissolved only by death. It is true the Church admits there may be cause for separtion but never sanctions the forming of new ties. It is written: "What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder." The severing of the marriage relation—it seems to me the most terrible thing!" She flung out her hands with a passion te gesture as she uttered the last words.

Warfield turned swiftly and caught the little fluttering hands and held them as he asked softly:

Warfield turned swiftly and caught the little fluttering hands and held them as he asked softly:

"But, Theta, when love, the one thing that makes life worth the living is dead, would you have had her drag out a miserable existence with me, a man she did not love, or live in separate loneliness simply because the Church refuses to tolerate the remarriage of divorced persons? Would you deprive human beings of the right to love and happiness because of a wornout creed?" Gene was desperately pleading his own case but Theta did not understand. She had no answer ready to his questions. The touch of his hands confused her and she withdrew them quickly from his clasp.

"Don'tyou think we had better be getting home?" she said with a quick change of manner. "You, haven't seen mother yet."

At her words a sudden warmth suffused him. It was her strange use of his mother's name which brought that glow to his heart.

He smiled at the way she had avoided a reply and a light stole into his eyes.

"This is the opening battle and I have won!" "Yes, it is getting late, the sun is sinking and here is the stonewall. Let me help you over, Theta So—down you come as lightly as a snowflake."

As they went downward through the dell a hundred tender recollections of the olden time

Theta So—down you come as lightly as a snowflake."

As they went downward through the dell a hundred tender recollections of the olden time came back. The years rolled away and they were like boy and girl again.

"Do you remember. Theta, this is the hollow where we used to hunt for lady-slippers?"

"Yes," she replied softly, "and down here is the old pine tree where you carved our names so long ago."

Like two children they stole up to the tree and examined the rough bark.

"Why Theta, nature has played a queer prank with our names. She has obliterated the last part of yours and the first part of mine. As it reads now it is "Theta Warfield—""

"Let us not waste any more time," she interrupted with a very red face.

When they came to the brook, Theta paused dismay. The winter had not been very severe do the ice had formed only along the outer inks. The middle of the stream was running gh and free and brawling noisily over the ones.

"What shall we do?" she asked.
"We must try to find the old stepping-stones." he replied, glancing up and down. "Ah yes, here they are, but they are too wide apart for you, Theta. Perhaps," with a hesitating look at her, "you had better let me carry you over."
"No indeed," she replied independently, "I can manage very well."
He crossed the brook and stood waiting for her.

He crossed the brook and stood waiting for her.

Theta took one hesitating step, her foot slipped on the spray-wet stone, the next instant she would have been immersed in the icy waters had not Gene sprang forward and carried her swiftly to the opposite bank.

As for one precious instant she lay on his breast it may have been the temptation of the roses in her face and the red lips so perilously near which brought that sudden madness upon him, for before she could utter a protest he bent his head and crushed her lips with a kiss.

TO BE CONTINUED. TO BE CONTINUED.

The heroine of this story chooses between the church of her childhood and the man she loves. Firm in the belief of her early teachings the lover pleads in vain. Mrs. Jane White, Athol, Kentucky, would like clothing that can be made over for children. She has five from two years to eleven. The eldest is a girl.

Eugenia Moon, Cody, Virginia, is one of our most patient sufferers. Will not someone write her? Please do not forget the stamps.

I have distinctly stated in my letters, that I cannot exchange postal souvenir cards. I am truly grateful to all those who have sent me souvenirs but I cannot return the favor.

For an every-day housework dress, try a skirt made to come to the ankles, of black duck, perfectly plain and not too full, brown gingham shirt-waist plainly made, have two of the skirts and four waists, that gives enough for a change, and they will wear for years. A plain white tie made twenty-two inches long by five in width, trimmed on the ends with a bit of lace or embroidery, fasten in front with a fancy pin, or they can be made long enough to tie in a bow and ends, they are easily laundered and iron easily. One of my girls sent me one for Christmas trimmed with tatting and tucks. By the way half a dozen of the twenty-two inch length make an acceptable present for the housekeeper. A kitchen apron or two, together with two kitchen holders with slip-off covers that can be washed easily, these are so handy hanging by the stove to handle hot irons, frying pans, or kettles, tea towels, dust cloths, roller towels, for the kitchen will not be despised by the young or old housekeeper. Here 1 am writing about Christmas presents and Hallow E'en not here yet.

The "Dalsy Handkerchief Bag" in our June number is "a thing of beauty and a joy forever," and very dainty.

Mrs. Moore. Your letter reminds me of a May morning in 1894, when I visited Tia Juanna. We had spent six months in San Diego. What in the world did you do with fourteen hundred pounds of sweet pickled figs? I wish I had some of those ripe olives, guavas, apricots, strawberries and cherries this moment.

Gertrude Jessie, Mrs. Griffitts, Mrs. M. P. Hunter, Alice, N. H. I thank you all for the postals sent, I wish I could return them but I cannot. L. L. Your letter received, which I enjoyed. You are undoubtedly correct as to the fir balsam. You are one of the young Grandma's. I wish there were more like you. Send that letter in to the corner; it would be interesting to all our readers.

Mrs. George Ables writes that she sent some maple sugar to James Wall on his birthday. God bless her and others that helped to make the day one to be remembered.

Mrs. Seymour and Mrs. Collier. I was glad to hear from you both. Thanks for the card.

Lily Ann Witmer, Grabill, a dear little Christian writes me: "I am fourteen years old, I was converted last February. Oh! what blessed peace was brought to me, at that time. I am happy in the thought that I am the child of "The King," that I shall spend eternity with him in that beautiful home, that he has gone to prepare for me. Dear, dear friend, if I do not meet you here, I pray that I may in heaven." What beautiful thoughts, for a little child of that age; her home is in Indiana.

Clara dear, yours received. I regret you had to move.

Mrs. Gus Leff. Have you tried painting the swollen glands with Iodine?

Mrs. Edith Trenhaile. Shake hands on the husband question. It made me happy when I read your letter, and of the home ruled by love and affection, God bless those little ones. I hope they will continue to love and honor you.

Mrs. Crawford. No doubt you have your dark days, but with your bright sunny disposition you can see the silver lining, while some cannot. Do write again, your letter was one of the bright spots in our June number.

I am sending in Mrs. Linden's recipe for Tomato Catsup.

H. C., Cuba, Mo., sends me some money for my shut-in fund. Thank you in their name, I have in mind two birthdays that I shall brighten. God bless your kind heart, but I wish I knew your name. Will you not write me and reveal it? I certainly appreciate the confidence you have in me by sending the money to be used in that way. I am wishing to have a Christmas fund. What I sent out last Christmas was thoroughly appreciated, by our dear sufferers. The time will soon be here; let us not forget it, and our invalid friends.

Mrs. Summers. I am glad you are satisfied with the land in which you live. Illinois is a grand state. I love it. Write again do, and tell us of the cherries, that are so beautiful with you. I have a distinct remembrance of several stained frocks, and tumbles out of cherry trees, in endeavors to procure the luscious fruit.

I did not pass on the syrup recipe.

A great many are sending in subscriptions and getting St. Elmo for Christmas presents; it is in demand.

Letter of Thanks

DEAR SISTERS:

I want to thank the many who have written to me. I have enjoyed all the letters and would like to correspond with others, but cannot unless one of the sisters will volunteer as my secretary, which I think will be impossible. I believe I have answered all up to date and I feel more in touch with the whole "sisterhood" in consequence.

from papers and magazines are interesting and attractive. Whenever you read one, look through it and see how many pictures you can find to use, and in this way you can collect a great many from the advertisements alone.

How many of us are making new resolutions with the awakening of spring? It seems to me that is the best time of the year to renew our good resolutions, when Nature is renewing her good things. Why should we wish for a better resolution than the one to use every opportunity to say a kind word or do little helpful deeds. We can all be of some use in this way, if we cannot in some great way.

"Oh what a little thing can turn A heavy heart from sighs to song! A smile can make the world less stern, A word can cause the soul to burn With glow of heaven all night long."

Especially must we be kind to the little ones in our care. Of course when we are tired and things will go wrong, it is so hard to control our tongues. It seems to me that that is the hardest task of all, and one of the most necessary. But we must keep trying.

Tested Recipes from Comfort Sisters The writer's name or initials will appear at the end of one or more of the recipes.—Editor.

White Oak Cancer Cure

Buy or take the inner bark from a white oak, steep it slowly, then take the sap obtained and strain, then boil down slowly till about the consistency of oil, apply this, renewing at intervals, for nine days or more if necessary.

A case of cancer in the cheek was killed this way last winter, after which the doctor removed the roots.

If the white oak cannot be obtained, try tannic bark. Hoping some of the many who suffer in this way may be relieved I remain a Comfort sister. Mrs. E. E. Lister, Thornport, Ohio.

Jelly made of currants and raspberries, equal portions, is fine, scald the fruit, then drain in a bag (do not squeeze), put the strained juice on the stove and boil down one half, then measure and allow a cup of sugar for one of juice, and boil fifteen minutes, try it then and see if it jellies; if it does remove at once, and fill glasses. When cold and firm cut a paper to fit, wet with white of egg, and it will never mould, some pour on melted parafine. I make all fruit jellies in this way, and usually have good success. Girls above all things, do not call jelly "jell" if you love me. love me.

Chili Sauce

Six green peppers, six large onions, one tablespoonful of cloves, one tablespoonful of cinnamon, two tablespoonfuls of salt, two cups cider vinegar, two cups sugar. Boll all down until quite thick.

One pint of young string beans cut into such lengths; one pint of small cucumbers (an inch long) cut them into three pieces; three sliced cucumbers, one pint of butter onions peeled, four long red peppers cut small, one cup green nasturtium seed, medium-sized caulifiower, cut into small clusters. Put these all into a jar, thickly stewn with salt. Cover with cold water, put a plate on top weighted with a stone to keep the vegetables from floating, and leave in the cellar for three days. Drain off the brine, rinse with cold water thoroughly, by putting vegetables in a colander and holding under the faucet; return to jar, cover with fresh cold water and leave for twenty-four hours, then drain the vegetables and put in the following: Three quarts of vinegar, one teaspoonful of Hungarian sweet paprika, one teaspoonful of cloves, one teaspoonful of cleves, one teaspoonful of celery seed, two tablespoonfuls of curry powder, one teaspoonful each of ground mustard seed, mace, and grated horseradish, one and one half cupfuls of brown sugar. Let this mixture come to a boil before adding the vegetables, then let it simmer ten minutes after it boils. Turn into stone crock, cover closely, let stand forty-eight hours. Drain off the vinegar and bring it to a boil; pour over the pickles and leave for a day longer. Fill small glass jars, cork, and seal. Keep in the dark. It will be ready for use in three weeks, but is better if not used for six weeks. This is fine.

Our fifty-card Album is the most attractive on the market. On each page two cards may be displayed; the leaves are very heavy rigid paper stock of a heavy green shade, providing a very tasty and attractive background for all cards, and when two pages are opened together showing four cards, the appearance is extremely attractive, and one cannot neatly preserve a collection of Post Cards unless they are displayed in an Album. And better still, a very nice collection of Souvenir Postal Cards represents the individual and personal thought of absent or distant relatives and friends and they are very entertaining for visitors who enjoy looking them over; so, that in an Album, arranged in order, they are readily accessible and may be examined time after time with no harm to the Cards, and thus preserved in remembrance of the senders. No one thinks of collecting Souvenir Cards without an Album. Everyone wants an Album and the demand, just now, exceeds the supply. We are fortunate in having a great quantity on hand of first-class Albums which we are to distribute as premiums to those who will send us clubs of subscribers to this magazine as per our offer below.

Conducted by Cousin Marion In order that each cousin may be answered this column, no cousin must ask more than aree questions in one Month.

EPTEMBER is with us and the months of summer have gone away into the past, never to come again. Have all the cousins spent a pleasant summer? Have they made it pleasanter for others? Have they done with it what they could to help them go cheerfully into the saddest days of the year which come in the autumn? I hope so, and I hope the days that the poet has called the saddest will not be sad, because we must get busy over a big pile of letters.

The first one is from a cousin who wants big pile of letters.

The first one is from a cousin who wants her initial to be "Railroader"—that's a queer initial; isn't it?—and she lives at East Alton, Ill. She says she has been waving to a "pretty young fireman" on a train for over a year and doesn't know his name and address, and wants to know if it would be proper to ask him. My, my, cousin, why don't you wait till he asks for yours? Do you want to know him he doesn't care enough who you are to ask? How silly some girls are, and how unladylike some can be.

Era, Azalee, and Izetta, Frankfort, Ky.—Here

How silly some girls are, and how unladylike some can be.

Era, Azalee, and Izetta, Frankfort, Ky.—Here are three girls, fifteen years of age, asking about beaus when their letters show plainly that they should be thinking about spelling-books and grammars. When they are up on those homely subjects I'll answer their romantic questions. I'm sure it will be two or three years.

Troubled Cousin, Noble, III.—Why should I give you more advice when you failed to follow what I did give, and are now suffering from your carelessness? You will have to get out of it the best way you can.

Blue Eyes, Frankfort, Mich.—In view of the fact that he is engaged to another girl, your interest should cease. You say there is nothing deceifful about him, yet you tell me he was engaged to the other girl all the time he was making love to you and you only found it out when he went away. Don't you call that deceit? And not only of you, but of the other girl? Forget him, and keep him forgot.

Scottish Bluebell, Yelton, Okla.—It is very nice to give your best young man a Christmas or birthday present. Give him something that will be pretty and useful. (2) Girls of seventeen marry men of twenty-three, but they should not. They should wait four years and marry men of twenty-seven.

Blue-eyed Nell, Ft. Worth, Texas.—Of course

Blue-eyed Nell, Ft. Worth, Texas.—Of course a girl should not keep her marriage a secret from her parents, nor should she marry a man only twenty-one years old, and she seventeen. (2) Music and flowers and books and candy may be accepted as presents, but not rings, unless you are engaged.

Leoria, Lebanon, Mo.—From your description of the man I should say you ought to follow your friends' advice and let him alone. Certainly you can do better than that in Missouri. You will be safe in believing anything they tell you against him.

Nobody's Darling, Owingsville, Ky.—Don't

Nobody's Darling, Owingsville, Ky.—Don't bother about the soldier sweetheart. He isn't any good. His wanting you to run away with him after he had enlisted showed what he was. Don't write to him and don't ever see him again, if you can help it.

if you can help it.

Little Wild Bess, Duncan, Ariz.—Don't marry him till he has put his farm in condition and is able to support you nicely. I think he is filrting. If he loves you he will make a home or you to prove it. Otherwise, drop him.

Brown-eyed Susan, Ferndale, Cal.—Don't marry Tom if you are thinking of Jim all the time, and don't marry either so long as you don't know which one to marry. That kind of marriage only means misery and often shame. (2) How can a nice girl be "sociable to a man" whom she has not met? Are nice girls sociable to strange men in your town?

Blossom. Chillicothe, O.—In view of the fact whom she has not met? Are nice girls sociable to strange men in your town?

Blossom, Chillicothe, O.—In view of the fact that you are corresponding with a man of whom you know nothing, and never saw, you should not be surprised at anything he says or does, and he is quite warranted in saying anything he pleases. He has a right to think you don't care very much for yourself anyway. Before writing further you had better make his acquaintance.

Wild Cucumber, Sandusky, Mich.—The color of the hair and eyes has nothing to do with harmonious love and marriage. Light and dark may like each other simply as a matter of contrast, and they may never love, or they may. Love depends on a good deal more than mere color.

Wild Rose, Tina, and Daisy of Guymon, Okla., are referred to answer above to three girls of Frankfort, Ky. They all seem to have the same trouble—too many beaus and too few spelling-books.

books.

Dreamy Eyes, Chariton, Iowa.—Certainly you should tell the young man your parents object to your accepting attentions from him. If he is the right kind he will regard your parents' wishes. (2) You could not very well take him along with you to find the lamp, could you? Of course, he should wait in the dark till you go get it. (3) You should ask your escort to come in unless it is too late.

Buth Fondu Lac. Wis.—It is quite right to

Ruth, Fon du Lac, Wis.—It is quite right to Ruth, Fon du Lac, Wis.—It is quite right to ask him to call. (2) Kissing games are no longer the vogue except in primitive sections. They don't have them in Fon du Lac, do they?

Miss J., Newport, Ky.—The divorced man has a legal right to marry and if you love each other, and he is all right, the proper thing to do is for you to marry. Some people are prejudiced against divorced persons marrying, but most divorced persons marry and their marriages are about as happy as the other kind, and happier than their first attempts usually. It is entirely personal and you must decide for yourself.

Rosebud, Sharon, Conn.—When a girl has graduated she is supposed to enter society and accept the attention of men, so you may, if your parents do not object. As you are only sixteen you should not forget that you have a great deal yet to learn out of books, and should read much more than you go into company. Improve your mind and you will be that much more attractive to the right kind of men.

Edna, Elmwood, Ill.—Don't let him know

Edna, Elmwood, Ill.—Don't let him know that you love him. He will find it out for himself if he wants to know. If he doesn't want to know, you shouldn't want to think of him. You are too young to understand these things yet, and so is he, from what you tell me of him. It is all very pretty and you two must just be good friends till you are older. Then—well, if it is the same then, you will marry and live happily ever after.

"Souls were dangerous things to carry straight. Through all the spllt saltpetre of the world;" but that he succeeded fairly well might have been inferred from a certain scar on his throat, received while chastising two of his classmates who had caricatured him in doggerel under the title of "Sir Dandy Galahad." Misled by the quiet reserve of his manner, and an inborn courtesy that made him as good a listener as talker, strangers never suspected the existence of a temper fierce and, when fully aroused, wellnigh implacable. In his third collegiate year the death of his father left him untrammelled in the selection of a profession, and soon after he entered into possession of a fortune so large that its golden key would have opened the door of almost any career he might have chosen.

Ince the death of his stepmother, Mr. Herriott had established temporary headquarters in New York in "apartments" not far from the old Herriott house, which by provision of his wife's will was now the property of Judge Kent. While the family of the senator usually remained in Washington, Eglah and Mrs. Mitchell frequently spent a week in New York, and on such occasions, if Noel chanced to be in the city, they relied upon him to serve as escort when needed. That he had successfuny run the gauntlet of Eliza's years of cautious, suspicious observation, and finally commanded her admiring confidence, contributed in some degree to the easy camaraderie maintained between Eglah and Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to nubmit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending fifteen (16) cents, in silver or stamps, for an annual subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscriber enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately malled, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S HOME LA WYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail. Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons tecking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

G. S.—Upon the death of your mother, the executor of your father's estate should file a final account and divide the property. If you can agree among yourselves as to the value of the property, such division of the estate could be made upon the basis of such agreed valuations. You should employ a lawyer to draw the necessary deeds of the real estate and to see that the division of the estate was made in a legal way. (2) You can procure a certified copy of the charter of the corporation from the Secretary of State of the State under the laws of which the Company is incorporated, upon your payment to him of his fees for same.

A. L.—We do not think the young lady you mention him of his fees for same.

A. L.—We do not think the young lady you mention could be punished for the act you mention, unless she received some of the money from the cashing of the checks, or unless some fraud was perpetrated in connection with the cashing of the checks. We think the act you say she committed was technically a punishable one, but from your explanation of the way she came to do it we think she could clear herself, provided, of course, no one suffered any loss from her act, and she received no benefit therefrom.

fered any loss from her act, and she received no benefit therefrom.

Mrs. E. L. E.—Upon your statement to us we are of the opinion, that neither you nor your brothers and sisters who signed and executed the deed of the property, you mention, to your father could recover it from the present owner. After you executed the deed conveying the property to your father, he had a perfect right to convey the property to any person he saw fit.

Mrs. J. A. J.—Under the laws of the State you mention, we are of the opinion that the man you mention could sell the property without the signature of his wife to the deed; upon his death, we think that all his property, except community property would go to his children, provided, of course, he left no will. The community property, consisting of the profits of all the affects administered by the husband, of the produce of the reciprocal industry and labor of both husband and wife, of property acquired during marriage by donations made to them jointly or by purchase in the name of either during said marriage, would upon the death of the husband go, one half to the widow and one half to be divided among the children.

O. S.—Your communication to us presents no inquiry the children.

O. S.—Your communication to us presents no inquiry calling for an opinion on any legal matter. We, however, take the opportunity of advising you not to take too seriously the letters of the young lady with whom you are corresponding, if you have never met her, as we infer from your letter that she may be quite a different person from what you think. She may be carrying on the correspondence with you simply in a spirit of mischief or fun. Possibly she may be all that you think she is and might make you an excellent wife, if you have that in view. We think that if you feel you desire to follow the matter up, you should manage some way to become personally acquainted with her. After you become personally acquainted with her, and the property of judgment you can learn to understand her likes and dislikes, and, what is more important, her disposition and character, but even then, be your courtship successful, you take some risk of returning home a sadder, but wiser man.

Mrs. M. S. D.—We are of the opinion, that the relivence ter, but even then, be your courtship successful or unsuccessful, you take some risk of returning home a sadder, but wiser man.

Mrs. M. S. D.—We are of the opinion, that the railroad company you mention cannot take the property you mention without first acquiring title to the same; that they can acquire title, or a right of way over the property, either by purchase at a price agreed upon between them and the owner of the property, or by condemnation proceedings (i. e.—a proceeding in Court for the purpose of fixing the value of the property, or the right of way over the same; in which event the owner of the property would receive the amount fixed by the court as a reasonable value of the property condemned.) In the event of such a proceeding it is often advisable for the owner to be represented by an attorney in order that the facts submitted to the Court shall constitute such evidence as to necessitate a judgment by the Court for the full value of the property; as in case no evidence is submitted to the owner of the property, the railroad company might put in evidence which would result in their getting the property at less than its true value. No company or individual has any right to confiscate property or take it in any way without due process of law.

C. W. N.—An examination of the deed you mention would be necessary before rendering an opinion on the question you submit, but as near as we can gather, from your statements to us, the title to the property you mention vested, at the time of the purchase, in the two sons, subject to a life estate of the mother; if this is the case the property, unless the same has been conveyed by the parties interested, would now belong to the heirs at law, or devisees of the deceased son, and to the surviving son, subject, of course, to the life estate of the mother. The only way to dispose of the interests of the heirs of the deceased son in the property would be by purchase from they would either get a portion of the land or the value of their share in money.

Mrs. O. H.

of their share in money.

Mrs. O. H.—Provided the charter of the borough you mention is broad enough, we are of the opinion, that the borough council, or governing board, would have power to grant a telephone company a franchise to run their wires through the streets of the borough and to make such changes in the condition of the streets as are necessary for that purpose, but not to interfere with private property; perhaps the tence you mention was on the street, or perhaps the company took more liberty than their franchise allowed them. We do not think they have any right to interfere with private ownership except as empowered by law, without being liable for damage.

Subscriber.—We are of the opinion that the parent you mention, if he possesses testamentary capacity, can by a will cut a child off from any share in his or her estate.

Miss J. C.—We are of the opinion that the fact that you changed your mind about taking the lesson in dressmaking would not relieve you from your legal liability under your contract; perhaps, if you let the matter drop, the person with whom you made the contract would not try to enforce the collection of further payments. We know of no way for you to recover the amount you have paid.

Mrs. H. V. H.—We think that any action, or proceeding, you might bring against the woman who led your husband to transgress, would result in more unhappiness and trouble to yourself and children than to the woman you mention. Such women, as you say she is, have very little to lose, while any further agitation of the matter would keep you in a constant state of bitterness and trouble, and the probable result would be that your husband would have to bear the most of the blame. You say you have forgiven your husband. This seems to us to have been the wisest thing for you to do, and our best advice to you is, to add to your forgiveness, forgetfulness, and to turn your mind to happier things.

Jerry, the Backwoods Boy

that time he discharged his man servant for stealing. This servant concocted a scheme with a New York lawyer to swindle the merchant out of his New York holdings. But the merchant got wind of the plan, and both the servant and rascally lawyer had to leave the city in a hurry. "The servant was much enraged over his failure to swindle his former employer, and under threats compelled his wife to steal the little boy Jeremiah and bring him to a small settlement on Long Island. Here the good-for-nothing husband and the rascally lawyer laid a plot to make the merchant pay dearly for the return of his child. But the authorities got wind of the affair and the evil-doers had to fiee once more. Then the husband of the woman went on a long spree and tried to kill the little boy, but the woman took the child, wrapped it up in this blue overcoat, and left it at the door of the poorhouse. Shortly after that the woman got employment with a family of Philadelphia and went to that city, and the good-for-nothing husband lost his life by falling off the Battery into the water and being drowned."

"Amos would not have been so bad if it hadn't been for that rascally lawyer," sighed Mrs. Starfield. "He was led on, Amos was."

"More than likely," answered Henry Maxwell.

"Do you mean to say I am the son of that "More than likely, answered Lenry small well.

"Do you mean to say I am the son of that merchant of Boston?" asked Jerry.
"Yes, Jerry, there seems to be no question about it. Your real name is Jeremiah Robert-well.

"Do you mean to say I am the son of that merchant of Boston?" asked Jerry.

"Yes, Jerry, there seems to be no question about it. Your real name is Jeremiah Robertson.

"Is my father living?"

"Yes, and your mother too, although both are now no longer young."

"Where are they?"

"Here, in New York."

"Will you take me to them?"

"O. course I will."

"At that moment Mrs. Starfield set up something akin to a wail.

"What is to become of me?" she whined.

"Ya say it would protect me if I confessed."

Henry Maxwell.

A little later found Jerry, the merchant, and Henry Davenport on their way to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Maurice Robertson. The boy felt as if he was in a dream, and pinched himself to see if he was really awake.

Soon the coach stopped in front of a fine mansion and Mr. Maxwell went ahead and rang the bell. They were ushered into a parlor and a fine gentleman came to meet them.

"This is Mr. Maurice Robertson?" questioned Mr. Maxwell.

"That is my name, sir," was the answer.

"What can I do for you?"

There was an awkward pause, broken by Jerry who stepped forward.

"Mr. Robertson, I am looking for my father," he said bluntfather?" faltered the other.

"Yes, sir, Mr. Maxwell thinks that you are my father, and a certain Mrs. Starfield, who was once your servant, thinks the same. She says I was stolen from home when I was a baby." Maurice Robertson drew a quick breath and gazed at Jerry as if stunned.

"Can it be true!" he murmured. "After all these long years!"

"In think it is true," put in Henry Maxwell.

"Let me tell you the whole story," and in as few words as possible he did so.

"You will wonder how I got on the track of this mystery," he said. "Jerry had done me a good turn and I resolved to aid him all I could. I engaged one of the smartest polle-officials and the countral of Mrs. Starfield confessed, after I promised to do all I could to protect her from the law. She is old, and drink has almost finished her. Besides, I think she speaks the truth when she says that that lawyer was to blame

The Value of a Trade-Mark.

The Value of a Trade-Mark.

A trade-mark is usually some one particular mark on goods to show their origin, but, as a matter of fact, any new original quality, feature or characteristic of an article of manufacture, if widely made known through advertising becomes valuable as a trade-mark, and is protected by the courts, so that one article may have many "trade-marks" that belong to it alone. Thus for example, in the case of Cascarets. Candy Cathartic, the name "Cascarets" the expression "Candy Cathartic, "the peculiar shape and color of box, the octagonal tablet, and the letters "C. C. C." on each tablet are expressive trade "marks" of that popular medicine, because 'they indicate their genuineness, distinguish them from imitations and have become universally known to the people.

T. B., Youngstown, N. D.—Pimples and blackheads—which are practically the same thing—are common at your age and will disappear as you grow older. About all that you need do now is to keep your face thoroughly clean with hot water and pure soap, massaging the skin gently to improve the circulation. The blackheads may be pressed out, but do not squeeze them so hard as to bruise the skin. Give your eyebrows also time to grow. The cocoanut oil will do no harm.

Blue Eves. Sanford Va.—With your eyessive.

Blue Eyes, Sanford, Va.—With your excessive fat, the bumps on your face and the lack of rosiness in your cheeks, you need a course of treatment by a physician. Carelessness at your age may mean a long life of ill health, or death before you are thirty.

before you are thirty.

M. Z., Jackson, Cal.—It may be necessary for you to take medicine all the time to prevent constipation just as your physician prescribes. He should know more about your case than we do. We can say, however, that you may assist nature very greatly by taking the exercise prescribed in physical culture books and we advise that you get sucn a book and follow its instructions. You must do what it says, though, and not simply read it and think that is enough. Some people are too lazy to be well and strong. J. U., Coloma, Wis.—Your physician is right—you should go to the dry air of the high western country, Colorado is cold and dry, Arizona and New Mexico, hot and dry. Either is good, and will cure your bronchits and catarrh if anything will. Unless there is consumption in your family somewhere near, you haven't got it, but what you have will go into it if you neglect it and try to cure it with medicine. Climate is the thing. Go to the dry air and get well.

J. M. P., Blakesburg, Iowa.—You have asked for a "recipe" to cure organic troubles which the most profound physicians of the world fail to control with any degree of certainty. Under the circumstances you will understand why we don't cure you on the spot. Your only chance is to consult the physician you know best.

a little careful of your diet and don't eat too much fats and sweets.

Benita, Headrick, Okla.—You should consult a physician on the more serious part of your trouble. The coughing and spitting in the morning are due in part, we believe, to poor digestion. Eat lightly at evening, and before going to bed drink a glass of water with a teaspoonful of cooking soda dissolved in it. Drink another glass when you get up. That may not cure, but it should relieve. See the doctor about the dizziness that comes at stated intervals.

Mrs. R., Eldorado, Okla.—While your physician is in attendance why not get from him a prescription for the skin blotches, as he knows from personal observation what causes them? He would not charge you for it. We can only say that you should diet yourself and get your blood in good condition. Take a dose of Epsom salts before breakfast, two or three times a week. A good skin whitener and softener is made of four parts of yellow of egg and five parts glycerine. Work them thoroughly together. Apply to the face on going to bed. Rub well into your hands after washing. This is very simple, but is efficacious for freckles, moth spots and blotches.

spots and blotches.

J. D., San Antonio, Texas.—You are doing for piles about what most people do who suffer with them—keeping the bowels open. They are practically incurable when once well started, though sometimes an operation may effect permanent results. They may be relieved by care and the patient will suffer very little, but they will become troublesome when neglected. Some of the advertised remedies are excellent. But you will have to try several in order to learn which is best for your case. Of course, you understand that absolute cleanliness is necessary. Washing in ice cold water is always quieting. quieting.

quieting.

Orange Blossoms, Fon du Lac, Wis.—Your greasy complexion may be relieved by eating no fat or sweet food, and drinking plenty of water, with little or no coffee. The surplus grease you eat comes out largely through the pores of the skin. Don't try to reduce flesh by drinking vinegar. It may produce results, but you will not be in a condition to enjoy your lack of flesh. Lemons are not harmful. On the contrary they are good to take in moderation. But don't "suck a lemon" as some do. Dilute the juice with water.

C. N., Evanston, Ill.—Spanish fly is known

"suck a lemon" as some do. Dilute the juice with water.

C. N., Evanston, Ill.—Spanish fly is known to the druggists as cantharides. Its "weight measure" depends upon how much you want. Ask the druggist. Haven't you a drug store in Evanston? (2) We are as authoritative as anybody on the subject of conquering the liquor habit without the aid of "antidotes and cures." The only way to do it is to quit and stay quit.

Subscriber, Morristown, Tenn.—We hardly think you have "heart trouble," but we do believe you have a pretty bad case of indigestion. Don't doctor for anything else but that and get those four doctors to advise you what to do. Don't take much medicine. You only need a laxative occasionally and a glass of water with a teaspoonful of cooking soda dissolved in it, before meals, and perhaps before going to bed. Then eat simple food, eggs, milk, rice, thoroughly toasted bread, no coffee,—break dry bread in the milk—plenty of water between meals and practice the exercises prescribed by physical culture books. Do these things faithfully and you will regain your health.

S. J., Comet, N. C.—Your cold, with evening cough, is probably bronchial. There are so many cough remedies that we hesitate to offer one. You can get a better one at any drug store than you can compound yourself. About thirty grains of quinine in half pint of whiskey taken in teaspoonful doses will afford relief, if you are not handy to a drug store. The climate has something to do with its hanging on so long. Try a couple of weeks at or near Asheville, unless you are already in a similar climate. Change of air is what you need.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT readers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta Maine.

Gray-eyed Twins, Fairmount, N. D.—You greet the relatives of your new husband's just as you would greet your own kin whom you were meeting for the first time. You would know how to do that, wouldn't you? The wedding supper or luncheon must depend entirely upon the means of those giving it. It may be very simple or very elaborate, and still be in equally good form. A reception by your young friends, would be very pleasant and proper.

Black Eyes, Kerrville, Texas.—We will give you no recipe for painting the face white, no matter if other girls do use it and you want to. Keep your face well washed and use a little simple powder occasionally is all you need. The other is vulgar and nice ladies don't use it. If you have a naturally brown skin it may be made as beautiful as the whitest by proper care and no rank cosmetics. Why do you want a drug-store complexion?

Pansy Blossom, Spencer, Ind.—Look up your

Pansy Blossom, Spencer, Ind.—Look up your almanac for the moon's signs. (2) You can't make your hair golden except by using chemicals that will do much more harm than good, besides making you appear as something that you are not. Let your hair be the way the Lord made it.

Lord made it.

Dolly, Circleville, O.—Your hair is rather neutral, and you can wear any colored ribbon, if not too pronounced. (2) Better not use anything on your hair to make it less greasy. If you get it dry and harsh it will begin to fall out. (3) The pinching of the nose pimples is what has done the harm. Stop the pinching and wait for time to make good the damage.

Heart's Content, Sand Lake, Mich.—We think it will be safer for the lady to put her arm around the gent while driving, because he can have the use of his hands to handle the horse. However, etiquette is rather indefinite on that point, and they can fix it to suit themselves. P. S. Be sure to drive a safe horse. (2) The lady sits at the man's left while driving. You don't expect the man to drive on the off side, do you? (3) Ten thirty is the proper time for a caller to depart, Sunday or any evening.

Mamma's Darling, Bethel, O.—It is the custom in the less formal social circles, town or country, for the lady to go to the door with a caller, though when a girl is only fourteen as you are, she should not have carliers unless with her mother. Sae might kiss her caller good night if her mother consented and watched her do it.

Blue Eyes, XXXtown. Texas.—If we recomdo it.

Blue Eyes, XXXtown, Texas.—If we recommend the first young man you ask about what shall we do with the other? Hadn't you better wait until you know your own mind? In the mean time go ahead having a good time without caring whether they are the ones or not. (2) Sisters are apt to be jeatous of each other, and you must get along with yours until you marry and have other troubles to worry about. Grey Eyes, Moor's Hill, Ind.—It is not fair to the young man to drop him without giving him a chance to set himself right if he can. Ask him to explain. If he cannot do so satisfactorily, that will be the time to drop him.

Western Girl, Harvey, N. D.—If it is the custom of your community to hold hands without squeezing then there is nothing improper in it. Violet, Faribault, Minn.—It is not the lady's engaged unless the man is so ignorant or stupid as not to give it to her without asking.

Violet, Faribault, Minn.—It is not the lady's place to ask for the ring when she becomes engaged unless the man is so ignorant or stupid as not to give it to her without asking.

L. W., Peru, Ill.—The lady speaks first, unless they are well known to each other and friends, and then either may speak first. (2) The man should lead the way off the car and assist the lady to alight if she needs it.

Comfort Sister, Dullman, Ill.—Always thank a man or any other person for any courtesy extended, though in the case of an escort it is not necessary to be constantly thanking him when you can show your appreciation by saying how much you enjoy what he does for you.

Brown-eyed Gyp, Charleston, W. Va.—A remedy for freckles—if you must insist upon applying remedies to them—is composed of sulphocarbolate of zinc, two parts; glycerine, twenty-five parts; rosewater, twenty-five parts; alcohol, five parts; rosewater, twenty-five parts; alcohol, five parts; Your hair is a very nice color. Let it remain so.

Don Quixote, Chester, Miss.—We believe the Don Quixote, Chester, Miss.—We believe the custom everywhere is that gentlemen do not tip their hats in passing on the street ladies whom they do not know. Of course, you tip your hat to ladies who refuse to recognize you. You tip your hat as you shake hands at parting or meeting.

Blue-eyed May, Lancaster, Ky.—Don't be finicky. Though you were never formally introduced your acquaintance is just as proper and you should invite him to call and take a walk with him, too, when he asks you. Afternoon callers usually get away just before the evening meal, unless they are asked to stay. (2) If you want the caller to stay though he says he must be going, you can tell him so. But don't coax him. He frequently says he must go, just to be coaxed.

Tomato Relish

Tomato Relish

One peck of ripe tomatoes peeled cold, chop three heads of celery, five red peppers, one small cup of sait, drain off and add two pounds of five cups of vinegar. Put in glass jars cold—in took.

MRS. AURILIA SAYRE, Sibley, Mich.

Split crackers, and put in deep dish, a layer of the coax hit.

J. M., Gaffney, S. C.—It is not necessary to acknowledge the receipt of an acknowledgment of a gift, though if you want to write to the young lady, it offers a good opportunity. The proper inscription on a man's card, unless he has a title of some kind, is simply, "Mr. John Milton." The street address should be given on city cards, in the lower corner, right or left.

Sad Heart, Beckwith, Tenn.—Break the engagement by all means. He does not care for you or he would not be so neglectful. Besides how does a boy only eighteen years old know how to act as an engaged man? He should be at home with his mamma.

R. C., Throop, Cal.—Unless you wish the hair on your arms and hands to become like whiskers you had better not attempt to remove it. A specialist can remove it permanently if you want to pay him several hundred dollars. An old-fashioned shave is just as good a depilatory as those mixed in a drug store and lasts just as long.

Know-nothing, Mew. va.—We do not know anything about the lady. You may write to her in care of her publishers. (2) The eyebrow pencil must be used very skillfully not to be detected. Your druggist can get it for you from a dealer in druggist's supplies. We advise you not to use it.

Brier Rose, Sebeka, Minn.—Simply mention the man's name to the ladies and their names to him, or better, say "Mrs. J., this is Mr. K.", "Mrs. L., Mr. K." The mere mention of names after the first introduction is enough. (2) Better try the hot milk to make the eyelashes grow. It can't do any harm.

J. F. M., Clearbrook, Va.—Vaucaire's remedy is said to be the best. We do not know from personal knowledge what its merits are, but it has the reputation. Its cost would depend upon where you had it prepared. Have you ever reled the developing exercises prescribed by the physical culture books? It is very much like work, but it produces results in many instances. The majority of cases we believe are beyond help. Pumpkin Bud, Brazil, Ind.—In the old-fashloned times it was proper for children to be taught to say to their elders; "Yes, sir, No sir; Yes Ma'm, and No Ma'm," with "Sir" and "Ma'm' in response to a direct question. But they do not teach it so any more, and until recently nothing seemed to be taught instead. Now, we believe, they are beginning to teach children to say "Yes, Papa," "No, Mamma," and other relatives similarly, but so far nothing definite seems to be taught them as to how they should reply to done, for the directed "Yes," "No," and "What." are almost barbarous, and we advise you to take up the old-fashloned "Yes Sir" and "No Ma'm." I may have its fauts, but nothing better has yet been offered. "Beg pardon," or "I beg your pardon" is used by older persons as a substitute for "What?" or "What did you say?" but that is too cumbersome for children's constant use. Maybe we'll have something right old-fashloned method you have the military but and naval schools of the United States. Cadets always say "Sir?" "Yes Sir" and "No Sir."

Anxious Darling, Carman, Ill.—If the young man does not know when to go home it is the lady's place to tell him. This is proper and onot, they should be taught. (2) If the man is an authority for teaching the old-fashloned method you have the military but have young man does are the best to use, sealing with wax, though the glass jars are used extensively. I send this recipe in for the sister who requested it some time ago.

Baking Powder

One pound of cream of tartar, half pound each of baking powder and corn starch, mix well, then sift.

Ribbon Pudding

One quart of sweet milk or cream, one cup granulated sugar, put in double boiler, dissolve two heaping tablespoonfuls of corn starch in a little cold milk, and stir into the above until thick and creamy. Have ready the whites of six eggs, beaten stiff, add this to the boiling mixture, stirring in very carefully and lightly. After removing from the fire add pinch of salt. Divide this mixture into three parts, melt two squares of Baker's chocolate and stir into one part. Color the second part pink, and have twice as much white, as a layer of white is put into a glass dish first, then the pink, then white, then chocolate, and lastly the white, cool until firm, serve with whipped cream. (This was sent in by either Miss Hutton or Mrs. H. H. Smith, in our November number.)

J. A. D.

Jersey Pickle

Two quarts onions chop fine, two quarts green tomatoes chop fine, and salt down for a couple of hours before mixing, squeeze juice out, six green peppers chop fine, four quarts Lima beans, cook till tender in clear water, with pinch of salt, two quarts string beans, break short and cook same as Lima beans, drain beans, chop fine, one dozen whole pickled cucumbers, one dozen ears corn cut small, ten cents' worth mustard seed, ten cents' worth dry mustard, one gallon apple vinegar, one and one half pounds sugar. Put vinegar in vessel, then sugar, mustard and mustard seed, and cook until it is nearly thick, stir often to prevent scorching. I cover my jars with paper, any pickle bottle will answer.

M. G. Browning, Atlanta, Ga.

Raspberry Punch

Mash sufficient berries to give two cupfuls of juice when strained. Pour this juice upon one cupful of granulated sugar and allow the sugar to dissolve. When dissolved, add the juice of a lemon and a quart of iced water. Serve very cold with a few whole berries added.

To Dry String Beans

Pick, wash, cut in strips, scald in salted water, place on tins and dry thoroughly. When wanted for use, soak and cook until tender, seasoning as you would green beans.

To Dry Corn

Cut from the cobs, spread in a dripping-pan and set in the oven long enough to scald through; remove or reduce the heat until thoroughly dried, and put away in paper bags closely tied up, when wanted for use soak over night, and cook for two or three hours.

EDNA WARD, Millican, Tex.

Brandy Peaches

To one gallon of peeled peaches add two pounds of sugar and let stand over night. Take a pint of the syrup and half pint of brandy, and one and one half pounds of sugar, and boil to a thick syrup; lay the peaches in about five minutes and put in glass jars.

How to Get a Let of Souvenir Postals Free

This exchanging of Post Cards has become a great fad all over the world and we are now helping our readers get thousands of postals without cost.

Get up a club of subscribers to this paper and have your name put in this list free; you will then receive many exchanges in souvenir postals of all kinds, and will be in a position to return the favor to all who see your name in the list and send you cards. The Publishers simply ask the slight service from you of getting up these small clubs. We will send an assortment of six cards for clubs of three, or twelve for a club of five. In sending in your club, say whether you want them from any particular city or just assorted up. You can start your collection this way and then exchange with others as you see their name in the list. The following persons wish to receive Souvenir Postals and agree to return all favors. Positively requests will not be inserted here, unless a club of at least three subscribers is sent with the name. The publisher will then send you an assortment of Postals free, per offer above.

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT readers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered as far as may be.

COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions in this column. They will thus save time, labor and postage. Letters reaching this office after the 26th of the month cannot be answered in the issue of the following month.

C. K. S., Hancock, Md.—You are not far from Washington, where the Secretary of Agriculture has his headquarters and where you can get any and all kinds of seeds. Write to him for information. If he cannot supply you he can tell you where you can get them.

A MODERN HARMONICAS

The new model 1907 instrument with big nickel horn for sound variations is the most modern Harmonica in use. Just improved and patented, it furnishes a new field for Harmonica music, as one is enabled to give the beautiful softer fect to certain notes which renders the interpretation of many songs to the satisfaction of the hearer. Some of the hearer. Some kinds of music is written for loud notes, other music is largely composed of softer notes, and it is to properly render these variations that this new model has been devised. The Harmonica is a full-size instrument, easily played, and being attached to this Silver Nickel Horn, the notes are modulated and magnified until the sounds are distinct to all hearers, making it extremely desirable for concert work. Single, double and triple "tongueing" feat can be readily performed with this Harmonica and the horn can be made to respond to the player's feelings by the proper use of the Phone. To convince you this is our best Harmonica production. we will send you one free if you will send us a club of only two yearly subscribers to this paper at 16 cents each. A Free Treatment to All Who As

If you are sick—if you suffer—if you are afflicted with any ailment—if you are worn out, tired or failing—if you have an ache or a pain—if you need medical advice—if you are not in perfect health—if you lack the energy, vim, vigor and "go" that make life worth living, whether you are rich or poor—old or young—man or woman, read what I have to say, hear what I have to offer you.

Positive Proof Without Price

I have probably had more experience and more success than any living physician, but I don't ask you to believe that. I don't ask you to believe that my remedies are better than others. I don't ask you to take my word for anything. But I do ask you to give me a chance to prove my ability—to prove what my treatment will do for you—to prove that I can cure you—and to prove it at my own expense—to pay the cost, every penny of it myself. I ask permission to send you—to deliver into your hands—absolutely without cost to you a proof treatment that will convince you. Remedies that have cured thousands, remedies that I believe will cure you.

May I Send the Proof?

This is all I ask. No money—No promises to buy—No papers. On the virtue of my treatment I base my reputation. On your gratitude and honesty I base my hope of reward. I hold the record of thousands of cures—not "some better," but cured to stay cured—restored to perfect health. Is the prospect of being hearty and strong and big and well worth a few minutes of your time and a two-cent stamp? That's all it costs. Don't let the opportunity pass.

What COMFORT Offers You!

Two new stories continue in this issue and we propose to publish during the coming fall and winter months the most interesting and entertaining issues of COMFORT we have yet brought off our presses.

We are anxious to begin this early Autumn subscription campaign in order that we may obtain the greatest possible number of new subscriptions, also renewal orders, before January 1st, 1908. We start right in by giving you a bigger and better COM-FORT instead of promising improvements, and a partial list of what is now commenced in this issue, or is to appear next month and in November, must be interesting reading for you and convince you of the superiority of COMFORT as the favorite and ideal home monthly magazine, now entering its twentieth year of usefulness.

Two New Stories this Month

From "St. Elmo" to "A Speckled Bird" is a continuation of the feast. The very popular success "St. Elmo" convinces us that "A Speckled Bird, by the same author, Mrs. Augusta J. Evans Wilson, will become its rival among all our readers, and it is a source of pleasure to us to be enabled to offer this great will become its rival among all our readers, and it is a source of pleasure to us to be enabled to offer this great serial, which will appear in generous monthly installments during the coming season. The opening chapters appear now, and we invite your attention to it, knowing you will be at once interested.

"Only a Girl; or, From Rags to Riches," By FRED THORPE, a delightful girls' story, opens with vim and vigor characteristic of the entire story, which is bound to absorb the reader from beginning to end. We have been indeed fortunate to obtain the privilege to publish such a splendid story, which appeals as readily to the older as well as to the younger generation. It is good for anyone to read such a story as "Only a Girl."

"Only a Girl."

Mary J. Holmes and Oliver Optic stories are in hand and the first installments will appear in early numbers of COMFORT.

Our Mary J. Holmes' story, The Heiress of Beechwood, will be one of the wall be features of our magazine for the whole winter. No writer of popular fiction has produced in stories written by MRS. HOLMES, who at an advanced age still enjoys the numberless copyright stories, which a generous and admiring public are always of her favorite stories and is destined to become immediately popular with our standard for the first installments. Do not fail to be ready for the first installment.

"Charlie's Fortune," a very entertain persons at any age.

OLIVER OPTIC STORIES are not to be had in any and every "Charlie's Fortune," a very it will entertain persons at any age. publication; heretofore a prohibitive made it impossible to obtain serial stories, needs no introduction to COMFORT readers; the name and story title warrant the quality, and you have but to read to be entertained.

STILL ANOTHER NEW STORY. We have had a great call for more stories by that famous author, Ida M. Black, and take pleasure in announcing one of her latest and best serials entitled, The Death Bed Marriage or, The Missing Bridegroom, which we are sure all of our readers will appreciate when it appears in COMFORT this fall. These are only a few of the many new stories COMFORT will give you during the coming year.

"JERRY, THE BACKWOODS BOY," and "THE SHADOW OF A CROSS," continue to appear in regular installments. In each instance there are some of the best features of the stories yet to appear and the closing chapters become all absorbing. A larger number of SHORT STORIES will be printed through the year, and our editors are now making selections from a great many treating on interesting subjects.

subjects.

The Pretty Girls' Club

is a NEW FEATURE, first presented last month, and our thousands of feminine readers will derive mental as well as physical benefit from our Beauty Column to be conducted on the most approved scientific lines by KATHERINE BOOTH, an authority on how to be pretty, as well as skin, scalp and facial defects in general. The article is to be interestingly conducted to suit all girls from eight to eighty and must be of impor-

Uncle Charlie, Boys' Corner, etc.

In addition to above programme, COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, IN AND AROUND THE HOME, SISTERS' CORNER, COUSIN MARION, ETIQUETTE EDITOR, HOME LAWYER, MUSIC, MANNERS AND LOOKS, FAMILY DOCTOR and the BOYS' CORNER, conducted by Uucle John, are each continued, and best of all, COMFORT'S big agency and premium reward plan is always available. The biggest and best premiums for the least number of subscriptions to the most popular home monthly published.

Word About Expiring Subscriptions

In order that you may continue reading our new stories and to induce new subscriptions for the coming season, to extend the field of COMFORT and further familiarize it among new families, we offer below an extra special subscription privilege. In addition to placing before you an unusual array of all new popular and practical premium gift articles which are free for small clubs of subscribers at our 15-cent rate and in order to have our expirations occur at the year end, we shall send COMFORT until December, 1908. In connection with club agency work we furnish catalogues, etc., free upon application.

15 Months' Subscription 15 Cents

You will not want your subscription to cease now that we have begun all of these stories and are to commence so many others right away; so if the number on the wrapper in which you receive this copy of COM-FORT is 227 or less, you should renew at once, sending 15 cents to December, 1908, otherwise you will be without COMFORT. So if you accept now and renew you get 15 months' subscription for 15 cents.

You get one of these dolls and you are sure that the nose can't be broken off nor can baby punch in the eyes; the bright colored cheeks and ruby lips retain their color and shape for all time. Every child delights to have from one to twenty different kinds of dolls in their family. Bright inventors, artists, and mechanics have been at work for years trying to perfect low-price, jointed, indestructible dolls that can be made to sit down, bend over, stand on their heads, move arms and legs, and be placed in all sorts of cute positions, either when dressed or undressed. The doll shown in cuts, fust patented, is a most wonderful and successful result of long, weary trials. They are beautifully finished, and can be brighted than anything ever gotten out before. For hours and hours every child will play with these good old grandma style, unbreakable stuffed dolls, even nutring aside the very axe.

Make Money Printing Cards.

About all boys have an ambition to learn a trade that will give honest employment and mental improvement. With our handy Printing Outfit a boy or girl can accomplish the art of type setting as well as printing, thus conquering two subjects at one time. These complete outfits consist of a six-font set of rubber type; that is, there are six of each of most all the letters in the alphabet except some important letters have eight, and others only four, such as all the letters in the alphabet except some important letters have eight, and others only four, such as and four handsome ornaments; also slugs or spaces to separate words—in all about 200 separate pieces of type. A two-line type holder for printing cards, etc. It works like a miniature Franklin printing press, so you can print cards for your friends and thus make money. A pair of nickeled pincers to handle type and a metal case ink pad. This ink pad is everlasting and can be renewed if constant use removes the ink. With each set we send a wooden type case so that type can be arranged and keptin perfect order, also full and complete instructions how to set type, etc. A wonderful outfit for printing cards or small amount of text. Will afford amusement and instruction unbounded. Every child will appreciate one and grown folks can make use of these sets for marking linen by procuring an indelible ink pad. It is probable such an outfit as we offer can not be found everywhere and we expect to give away a great many for the slight work done in getting subscriptions for us.

CLUB OFFER For a club of only 3 yearly subscribers at 15 cents each, 45 cents in all, we will send you postpaid one of these Printing Outfits all complete as described.

A Profitable Business

Any Man or Woman

Can Make a Lot of Money and Make It Right at Home.

For Over Twenty Years We Have Been Helping

MEN AND WOMEN To Make Money at Home.

OLD AND YOUNG MAKE MONEY

ONE OF OUR SUCCESSFUL

How to make money without a large capital has always troubled men and women, and never more than in these days. We have helped thousands of people to do this, who are not able to do hard work. And thousands of widows, through us, have been able to care for their families and educate their children. One woman writes us:

"I was left a widow with house mortgaged. For three years I have worked for you. I have paid off the mortgage, have $1,100.00 in the bank, and have paid all the expenses of one child at a boarding school, and cared for the others at home." A man who lost his position writes us:

"It was a god-send to me when I took up your work. I was almost down to my last dollar and my family was suffering. Since taking up your work, I have far more money than I ever had before, and my family has known some of the comforts of life. I have found you in every way honorable and your word as good as a bond." We have hundreds of letters like these.

Don't Be Fooled by Big Talk

We do not say you can make 25 or 50 dollars a day as some do. You know that is foolish talk, and those who promise such things insult your intelligence, and talk nonsense, but, we do say that any man or woman can make a good salary if they will take up our work. Some of those with us have been doing this for 5, 10, 15 and more years. You can do the same be you man or woman. The work we offer is easy and agreeable and can be done from your own home. Thousands of women who have worked for us during the past twenty years have earned as much as their husbands. A few days ago, a woman wrote: "My husband had been earning only a small salary, and four years ago I took up your work to help him—during those four years I have averaged over $1,200.00 salary each year, and now my husband is giving up his position, and he also will work for you."

It would be easy for us to say you can make from $50.00 to $100.00 a day, but it would not be true. And we believe it is always better to stick to the truth, both because it is right and also because only fools are caught by such foolish talk.

We will assure you a good comfortable income in our work and if you work steadily, even more than that.

IF YOU WANT A GOOD CHANCE TO WORK AND GET GOOD PAY FOR IT, YOU WILL FIND IT TO YOUR INTEREST TO READ THIS PAGE THROUGH CAREFULLY.

The articles we have for you to sell are a big line of Forks, Spoons, Knives, &c., made of a new metal called Brazil Silver.

We will describe these, then you can judge for yourself whether we are offering you a good chance to make money or not.

Brazil Silver
Warranted for Twenty-five Years

Brazil Silver is believed to be the very best metal in existence for the manufacture of forks and spoons; it has all the lustre and brilliancy of burnished coin silver, and is much harder and more durable, in fact, it is impossible to wear it out. It is absolutely indestructible. The goods made of this metal are the same all the way through; there to coin silver. It is as lustrous and pure as coin silver, and being much harder it will wear even longer than silver; in fact, it is absolutely impossible to wear it out. It will wear forever. As there is no plating to wear off, the metal being the same all the way through, it stands to reason that you can't wear it out. Our confidence in the metal is so great that we guarantee it to wear twenty-five years. We give a guarantee signed by the company warranting the goods to wear and to give perfect satisfaction for twenty-five years. We are an old, strong and thoroughly established firm, with ample capital to carry on our business and make our guarantee as good as the Bank of England. In selling these goods an agent can recommend them with the greatest of confidence, for they are just as represented, absolutely indestructible. And, furthermore, our guarantee warranting the goods to give satisfaction for twenty-five years clears the agent from all responsibility in the matter, for if any article fails to give perfect satisfaction, no matter how long it has been in use, we hold ourselves ready to refund the money paid for the article. These goods are the same metal all the way through; they will never wear out. They always wear white and bright. We give a guarantee signed by the company, warranting every piece of Brazil Silver to wear twenty-five years. You can sell these goods to your best friends with perfect confidence, for every sale is as much a benefit to your customer as to yourself.

Working with goods that are warranted to wear and give satisfaction for so long a time as twenty-five years, and by

Working with goods that are warranted to wear and give satisfaction for so long a time as twenty-five years, and by a company, too, whose capital is sufficiently large to make their guarantee good for almost any amount, is an advantage which no other firm is prepared to offer. If you want to make money fast, now is the time to do 'it. If you think that five-dollar bills are good things to have, now is the time to get them. Never in the history of the agency business have agents had as good a chance to make money rapidly, and it is reasonably sure that they will never have another chance like it.

All Marked With Initial Letters, Without Any Extra Gost

Among all classes there has always been a strong desire to have their table ware marked with their initial letter, but on account of the heavy expense of having it marked only a very few have been able to afford it. Heretofore the cost of artistically marking table ware has been even greater than the cost of the elegant Brazil Silver goods, all marked with any initial letter desired in the very highest style of the art, without any extra cost for marking. These Brazil Silver goods, even if unmarked, would be the greatest bargain ever offered the public in table ware, but with the additional and highly desirable feature of being all marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, these goods are not only great bargains in table ware, but are the greatest bargains that have ever been offered to the public through agents or in any other way.

The people are always ready enough to buy what they want when it is presented to them in the form of a genuine bargain. Well, here is absolutely the greatest bargain ever offered, and the agent who works with it will find that what he has is earnestly desired at nearly every house he visitatic seasy to get orders when you can offer great bargains that the people really want and can afford.

Solid Silver
Knives That Last
A Lifetime

The plating wearing off. How to make a solid Silver knives that seven years ago we succeeded. Every one knows that Silver plated Knives cause trouble by the plating wearing off. How to make a solid Silver knife that had spring like a steel Knife, the beauty of a silver one, and yet be solid silver with no plating to wear off and that had spring like a steel Knife, the beauty of a silver one, and yet be solid silver with no plating to wear off and that succeeded in making this knife. This is the greatest discovery made in 50 years, in cutlery. Today we are using these Knives bave proved a gold mine, and those who use them will never use any others. Think of it—Solid Silver Knives that never wear out, at no higher price than ordinary knives.

For those who are attached to plated Knives, we can furnish the finest tempered cutlery steel Knives plated with 12dwt of pure silver, hand burnished. Not cheap, shoddy plated Knives, but the best that can be made warranted for ten years.

But the solid Brazil Silver Knives that last a lifetime at price of ordinary Knives are the thing. When people see them, they will have no others.

We are not only selling at greatly reduced prices, but also guarantee every article just as represented, and give perfect satisfaction to the purchaser or MONEY REFUNDED.

The First Thing
To Do

If you decide to accept the agency, the first thing to do is to send to us for the agent's case of samples, which is the most complete and perfect case of samples that has ever been prepared for the convenience of agents. Our complete and perfect case of samples that has ever been prepared for the convenience of agents. Our complete and perfect case of samples is not to be compared with anything in the market that agents can sell as fast and sell as easily and make as much money out of as they can the goods contained in this splendid case of samples, and everything i arranged and explained so that any agent can't fail to understand just how to go to work and make a great success of the business. As soon as you receive the case of samples you are ready for business. And if you are willing to work you are just as sure to make a good income as the sun is to rise. Take the case of samples and canvass your territory according to the directions sent with the samples, until you have taken orders for the amount of goods you are prepared to send for. Then order the goods from us and fill your orders, and so continue.

The Magnificent Case of Samples Which We Furnish to Agents.

The case of samples which we furnish to agents contains the following articles:

Total retail value of samples - $2.83 1-3 cents We also send you with the case of samples a large and very beautiful catalogue, illustrating a full line of plated ware, such as Casters, Pickle Cruets, Butter Dishes, Tea Sets, Napkin Rings, etc.,

Reckoning the above samples at our lowest retail prices they amount to $2.83 1-3. We furnish them to agents nicely put up in an elegant sample case or roll, for only $1.00, which is $1.83 1-3 less than they amount to at our regular retail prices. This is less than one-half of the retail value of the samples, and much less than they cost us. The sample case or roll, which the samples are put up in, costs us nearly as much as we require you to send for the samples, case and all.

Watches and Jewelry.

We also furnish a fine line of Watches and Jewelry of all kinds. First class goods at low prices—great sellers. We send Jewelry Catalogue with outfit.

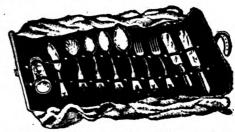

Wholesale Prices.

Wholesale or agents' prices and all necessary information for carrying on the business will be furnished with the outfit. Remember we make everything plain to you about wholesale prices, methods, etc., when we send you the Outfit.

Very Important.

Very Important.

The Outfit we furnish our agents is exactly as we represent it, and is always sent the same day the order is received, just as agreed. We have tried to state these facts so they could and would be believed, and still we are constantly receiving letters from parties who would like to engage in the business and would do so if they felt sure we were telling the truth and would do as we agree. Many of these doubters have been cheated and are not altogether to blame for doubting; the most of them say they think we are honest, they say we talk honest, but as they have already been swindled they don't feel like risking even one dollar, and so, although our business is in every respect just as represented and we always do just as we promise, we lose the services of a great many agents and they lose the benefits they might derive from the business because they are afraid we may not be telling the truth. Now, to overcome this spirit of doubt, we have decided to send Samples to all who wish us to do so, 'C. O. D., with privilege of examination at the express office. It costs us from twenty-five to forty cents more to send the samples this way, as we have to pay that amount for return charges on the money, but we are willing to do it and so prove to all that are interested that the Outfit and our goods are just what we claim. If after reading this notice you think you would like to give the business a trial, but wish to see the Sample Case before you pay the one dollar, cut out the following printed form, fill it out and send it to us, and we will send the Outfit to your express office prepaid, and give the express agent instructions to let you thoroughly examine the Outfit; then if you are satisfied that we have told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and are also satisfied that you can make money selling our goods, you can pay the express agent one dollar and take the Outfit. If you are not satisfied, you can refuse to take it, and the agent will re-

This cut shows the Sample Case or Roll, and how the samples appear put up ready for business. The Roll is made of highly finished waterproof cauvas, and lined with soft finning goods. The samples are held in place by strong straps. The whole rolls up and fastens with a leather strap which is firmly fastened to the back of the Roll. This is the most practical arrangement for carrying the samples that could be thought of. When rolled up the Case is compact and easy to carry. When opened the samples show to the best possible advantage, making a good impression at first sight. This Sample Roll gives a business-like appearance: it is substantial and handsome, and invariably gives the impression that there is something valuable inside. All are anxious to see what it is you are carrying around with such care. This is of importance, as it secures attention and interest at the start. The fact is, in the agency business, as in every other business, you must have things fixed up just right if you expect to succeed. Our Brazil Silver goods are the best that have ever been offered for the price, or anywhere near it. The new feature of being marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, free of cost, is the greatest popular hit of the times, and the Sample Roll is arranged so as to show the goods off to the best possible advantage. Furthermore, we carefully teach every agent just how to take advantage of all these splendid qualities and popular features. Is it any wonder that our agents succeed better than those who are working for other firms?

ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., DETROIT, MICH., BOX 8100. GENTLEMEN:—Send the Outfit by Express C. O. D., with privilege of examination. If I find the Outfit just as you say, I will pay the one dollar required and give the business a fair trial, but if I am not satisfied that the Outfit is as good as you recommend it to be, I shall refuse to receive it. Now, remember, the understanding is that I am not to take the Outfit unless I, myself, am satisfied that it is all right. It must all depend on my own judgment. If I am satisfied, I will take the Outfit; if I am not satisfied, I shall not take it and shall not pay the one dollar. If you want to send the Outfit with this understanding, send it along C. O. Crumbs of Comfort ing on the hearth and the long evenings spent in their cheerful glow, give us time to enjoy the work of our favorite authors and magazines. Now is the time that COMFORT comforts, cheers and entertains. Don't miss a copy, for COMFORT this winter will be better than ever before. Thousands of homes have never known COMFORT'S cheery influence and helpfulness. You know such homes—they are on every hand. Take compassion on COMFORTLESS homes and tell them have COMFORTLESS homes and tell them passion on COMFORTLESS homes and tell them how COMFORT can be obtained for fifteen cents a year. The people who would go without COMFORT when it can be secured for the trifling price of fifteen cents a year, must have determined to be at outs with the world, and to go through life diagruntled misanthropes. Friends, preach the gospel of comfort and good cheer, and remember the chief exponent of that joyous doctrine, is the magazine whose name is COMFORT. Remember if you subscribe now you can get the magazine until January, 1909, for fifteen cents. Fourteen copies mailed to your home for a little over one cent a copy. You can surely spare a cent a month for the best magazine in the world. Even this trifling outlay rou can strely spare a cent a month for the best magazine in the world. Even this trifling outlay can be saved and turned into profit, if you will consult our superb premium lists. Study this list and note the article you want, and you can earn it in an hour's easy work. Read what Mrs. Ennis of Narcoossee, Fla. did in a few hours between mealtimes. Mrs. Ennis, by a lucky chance, got a sample copy of COMFORT. COMFORT and she had never met before. She hadn't grown up with COMFORT as most of you have, but had only the contents of that one sample copy to fire her enthusiasm. She looked through that copy and it set her warm kindly heart aglow. She didn't care a rap for premiums. She hadn't a single selfish motive. Quite the reverse, for she felt it was her duty to put COMEORT into the hands of everyone of her neighbors for the sake of the good it would do them, and what is most important,—what her neighbors for the sake of the good it would do them, and what is most important,—what she set out to do, she did. She got twenty-one new subscribers in an hour, and she also induced each one to join the League of Cousins, of which they knew nothing, and for which privilege they had to pay an extra five cents. No premiums are given for subscriptions that include League membership, as the running of the League entails such a vast amount of detail work and expense that premiums are out of the League entails such a vast amount of detail work and expense that premiums are out of the question. However, Mrs. Ennis saw that the League was doing a great work, and she determined all her friends must join it—and they did. She brought in twenty-one new League members in a batch, which is, as she says, "going some", and establishes a record. Turn to page seventeen of our August issue and read of Mrs. Ennis' good work and try to catch some of her splendid enthusiasm, and you can easily obtain results as fruitful as hers, and those results will acorne to you if you will examine our premium lists. The young folks can take up this profitable work, if the older once are busy. Comport speaks for itself, and in the hands of child or grown up, it brings immediate results, for it is not only the cheapest but the very best and most helpful magazine of its kind in the whole world.

The sending of the Atlantic fleet to the Pacific is an act that every one will commend, as it is dictated by common sense, and is a precautionary measure against attacks en our Western coast, which, in the absence of a strong fleet, is very much at the mercy of a powerful and aggressive foe. The vessels ordered to the Pacific coast are as follows: Virginia, 14,948 tons, Missouri, 12,400 tons, Maine, 12,500 tons, Connecticut, 16,000 tons, Louisiana, 16,000 tons, Alabama, 11,522 tons, Rhode Island, 14,948 tons, New Jersey, 14,948 tons, Illinois, 11,522 tons, Kearsage, 11,522 tons, Kentucky, 11,522 tons, Ohio, 12,500 tons, Indiana, 10,288 tons, Iowa, 11,546 tons, Vermont, 16,000 tons, Minnesota, 16,000 tons.

In addition to these, several of our large huge cruisers will move into Western waters. The conveying of this great fleet from the Atlantic to the Pacific has caused much comment, as twas feared in the present strained condition of our relations with Japan, this movement might be construed as a hostile act. However, as the fleet is simply moving into our own waters, no nation, if it has friendly feelings toward us, need feel alarmed. We have a right to protect our Pacific coast, and it is for coast protection alone that our fleet was created, not for aggression. The very weakness of our fleet in Pacific waters, and the defenseless condition of our Western coast, has doubtless made the Japanese jingo element, regard us as an easy of our Western coast, has doubtless made the Japanese jingo element, regard us as an easy mark. With twenty battleships in the neighborhood of the Gelden Gate, the position of this country, from a strategic and diplomatic point of view, will be greatly strengthened, and no one will want, without sober thinking, to attack us. to attack us.

A strenuous fight is being made all over this country against consumption. Each city is taking up the work and engaging in a systematic tuberculosis crusade. Health departments issue advice and instruction to consumptives, and in New York old disused ferry boats have been anchored in the Hudson river for the use of tubercular patients who cannot get fresh air in the stuffy tenements in which get fresh air in the stumy tenements in which they live. On these ferry boats, trained nurses are on hand to care for the patients, and free nourishment, such as milk, eggs, etc., is provided and distributed at regular intervals of an hour or so daily. In St. Louis, the health department has issued the following circular to those suffering from lung troubles.

nour or so daily. In St. Louis, the health department has issued the following circular to those suffering from lung trouble:

"You must live in the open air. If you can do so, fix up a tent in your yard, on the roof, or on your piazza, and spend your time there. Fresh air and sunlight kill the germ that causes your disease. You must get at least nine hours sleep at night. Better ten hours. The more you rest, the more you eat, the more you stay out in the air and sunshine, the sooner will your body overcome the disease." The following diet is advised by the St. Louis board of health. It consists of six meals a day, and is as follows: "A glass of hot or cold milk on getting up in the morning. Breakfast, consisting of what you want, with two glasses of milk and one or two eggs. Lunch at ten A. M., a pint of milk and two eggs. Dinner, meat, vegetables, dessert, and a pint of milk. Lunch at three or four P. M., a pint of milk, and an egg or two." The first step towards the identification. King will soon be holding us in his icy grip. Already the logs are blazing on the hearth and the long eventings spent in their cheerful glow, ime to enjoy the work of our favorite and magazines. Now is the time that recomforts, cheers and entertains, is a cory, for Cowport this winter. samptives should remember that the disease is very easily communicable, and those afflicted with this terrible trouble, should use the utmost precaution, or they will quickly infect their loved ones and friends. The writer has seen a consumptive cough at the dinner table without turning his head, thus smothering the viands with the deadly germs of pthisis, which, later are taken into the systems of all those present.

There are half a million persons in the United States afflicted with tuberculosis. The actual loss in earning capacity of this vast number of people amounts to one hundred and thirty-six people amounts to one hundred and thirty-six millions of dollars yearly. Of all the people dying between the age of 15 and 60, tuberculosis kills nearly one third. By sensible, scientific, hygienic treatment, combined with plenty of fresh air, rest, and good nourishment, consumption will be eventually stamped out. It is already on the decrease. This is probably due to the fact that we know how to handle it, and that people live better; have better dwellings, and sanitation, and have a better and more nourishing diet than they had formerly.

One more word of advice to consumptives.
The majority of us do not know how to breathe. We do not as a rule use more than a third of our lung capacity. If we knew how to breathe and did breathe as God intended us to breathe and did breathe as God intended us to, there would be no consumption. By deepbreathing exercises alone the chest measurement can be increased from one to two inches in a very short time. Deep-breathing strengthens the lungs. A society is being formed in New York to start a deep breathing crusade, and to educate people upon this vitally important matter, a matter of which the majority of us are profoundly ignorant. Mrs. Emily Noble has written a book called "Method for the Millions," and it can be obtained free, by addressing her at the Murray Hill Hotel, New York City. This book has been endorsed by the international Congress on tuberculosis. Mrs. Noble went to India to teach the Hindoos how to be well; but instead of teaching them, by the international Congress on tuberculosis. Mrs. Noble went to India to teach the Hindoos how to be well; but instead of teaching them, they taught her. Mrs. Noble discovered that in India, where sanitary conditions are terrible, and the people are underfed, that diseases of the head, chest and throat are almost unknown. This is because the Hindoos know how to breathe. They breather rhythmically, and use their entire lung capacity. Mrs. Noble says: "By deep breathing, the lungs eliminate thirty per cent. of the waste material of the body in the form of poisonous vapor, which is constantly generating in the system through its electro chemic processes. There are only two sources of life, food and air, and breath controls them both." Respiratory exercises and correct breathing are absolute preventives of pulmonary troubles. Prevention is better than cure. To be able to resist disease is better than to conquer it. Probably in another year, the deep-breathing crusade will have made its influence felt in every quarter of the land. We have no doubt that correct breathing will be taught, and become a part of the curriculum of every schoolhouse in the United States, and we cheerfully do our part in extending a knowledge of this vastly important work.

The Force of Vegetation

A curious instance of the wonderful force A curious instance of the wonderful force exerted by growing vegetation is reported. Some half-hardy annuals were sown in a frame in a garden at Beckenham, England. Some days afterwards signs of cracking were observed in the brickwork, and gradually a block, weighing in the aggregate one and one half hundred pounds was pushed out of position. After cutting out several bricks a mass of mushrooms was found, three pounds, three ounces in weight, growing in the center of the wall.

About Music

Music is one of the grandest accomplishments a man can have. It is a language by which we express feelings and emotions too fine and subtle for words. But it is rank folly fine and subtle for words. But it is rank folly to suppose every boy has musical talent and its rank injustice to compel a lad without aptitude for music to spend long hours in dreary practice. There are thousands of ways of profitably employing the youngster's time, not the least of which is romping in God's open sunshine. Boys, study your own abilities, and if you have special talent for any line cultivate it to the fullest extent.

Something of a Building

"The man who lives in the one story house of two or three rooms," said the architect, "don't have any conception of what a really big building is. The biggest one on earth, used as a habitable place, is the new double structure in New York which will be the terminal of the McAdoo tunnel system under the Hudson river. It will be 22 stories high, will contain 4,000 offices, and will house 10,000 persons. It is estimated that 1,000 people a minute will pass through its halls, or about 600,000 a day. Thirty-nine elevators will carry people uptairs. The total area of all the floors will be 987,000 square feet, or about 23 acres. The ground area is about 70,000 square feet. Sixteen and a half million brick will be used, 4,500 tons of terra cotta, 5,200 doors, 5,600 windows, 500,000 square yards of plastering, 113 miles of electric wiring and 29 miles of steam pipe. It will be lighted by 30,000 incandescent lights attached to 13,000 fixtures. It will cost anywhere from five to seven millions. Nobody really can understand what a big building is until be sees one of these huge structures, and every year one goes up bigger than any of its predecessors. What the limit is, and there must be one, no architect has yet mid."

The W. U. Telegraph Company

"Some of the people of this great country have never seen an automobile, and perhaps there are some who have not yet seen a locomotive," influence felt in every quarter of the land. We have no doubt that correct breathing will be taught, and become a part of the curriculum of every schoolhouse in the United States, and we cheerfully do our part in extending a knowledge of this vasity important work.

A Christmas Box

HIS month I want to tell you all of the many attractive Christmas things which were the result of one practical which were the result of one practical woman's work since last July.

She decided to take the advice given in the department last fall and begin her Christmas gifts early enough this year, and have plenty of time to leisurely carry out her plans. I recently had the pleasure of looking over her big box full of dainty articles all ready for the labels.

As soon as the summer sew-over her big box full of dainty articles all ready for the labels. As soon as the summer sewing was finished she made her Christmas list of names, and opposite each put the name of the article that she thought she might give to that person. She found that to several she could give the same thing, so planned to make up three or four at the same time. For instance: she had three brothers to whom she decided to give ties and sleeve elastics. For the ties she bought thirty-two inches of nice soft silk, in changeable navy blue. This she cut into three strips, lengthwise—it being eighteen inches wide. The ends of the ties were to be two and one half inches wide, for a distance of seven inches on either end, and the remaining speeches. of seven inches on either end,

No lining was used. These were to be tied in a tight, double bow knot, and worn with turn-over collar—our illustrations Fig. 1 and 2 show the shape of tie flat, and when tied. These three ties cost her only seventy-five cents, but equalled any regular fifty cent tie, and being made of especially selected soft and durable silk would wear much longer.

longer.

For the arm elastics she got two yards of light blue silk elastic, three fourths of an inch wide, and made up four pairs. Each had a tiny rosette of the same colored satin ribbon to cover where the ends were joined. (See Fig. 3.)

Then being of an origi-nal turn of mind, for brothers and neighbors

These she cut in the shape of a derby, covered each neatly with dark silk, and finished one side with a plain band of ribbon and the wording as shown in illustration Fig 4. Fancy Aprons

Aprons are much appreciated, particularly the small, dainty, fancy aprons, which are rather expensive to buy. For these she got muslin with a tiny pink rosebud scattered over it; this was less expensive than the plain white muslin, and made much prettier aprons unless one could use a good deal of lace. For the rose-sprinkled apron no lace was used. The pattern she used makes an apron about three

A Crocus Pincushion

Cushions like the illustration were most dainty and surely are suggestive of spring. They were very natural and would brighten up any dressing case all through the dreary winter days.

The founda-tion was a small well-filled bran cushion, to the top of which was sewed the blossoms formed of the lawn scraps left from the floral contained many smaller articles, which can be even more easily made. I will tell you of these next month.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Eghert Maurice, a Confederate general, dies, leaving a wife and daughter, Marcia, and upon her the mother centers all her love and devotion. At seventeen, Marcia meets Allison Kent, a lover of forty, handsome, debonair and wily. There is a clandestine marriage. Mrs. Maurice goes to her child's room to kiss her good night, and tinds a farewell letter praying for forgiveness. The mother returns the letter and across it she writes: "My only hope is that God will take me out of the world before I see the face of the child who has disgrared the memory of her father and the name of her mother."

Mrs. Maurice is called from Europe by the death of her overseer, Robert Mitchell, whose wife, Eliza, is sheltered by Mrs. Maurice. Loving Marcia, Eliza intercedes with a letter. It is returned unopened. Dr. Eggleston and Bishop Vivlan plead for Marcia. The latter gives Mrs. Maurice a letter. Marcia is dying, and he asks the mother to be merciful. Mrs. Maurice writes the word, "Come."

mother to be mercitul. Mrs. maurice writes the word, "Come."

A boy, her dead first born, is laid in Eliza Mitchell's arms. Marcia Kent is brought home. Three days later she dies in her mother's arms, and whispers, "If my baby lives, keep her for my sake," and Eglah Kent is given to the care of the foster-mother, Eliza. At nine years of age she wants to know how old she must be before Eliza will tell her why her grandmother hates her father so.

Noel Herriott visits Mrs. Maurice and brings papers announcing Judge Kent's marriage to his stepmother, Mrs. Nina Herriott, and then Mrs. Maurice realizes that Eglah is Marcia's baby. She wants to comfort her. It is too late. Noel Herriott will be friendly with Eglah. She only wants her father.

Eglah is Marcia's baby. She wants to combit det. At so too late. Noel Herriott will be friendly with Eglah. She only wants her father.

Mrs. Maurice leaves instructions for Eglah's future care. Slowly disease weakens the proud woman. Eliza is wakened from a sound sleep by Eglah. She hears her randmother call "Egbert," "Marcia." They enter the memorial chamber where Mrs. Maurice sits in the silence that death consecrates.

Eliza guards Eglah and believes that the soul created for her baby boy who never breathed is living in Eglah. Two years later Mrs. Kent is suddenly killed. From that time Eglah dates the undivided attention she craves from her father. "Father" Temple, cousin to Judge Kent, invites Noel Herriott to Calvary House and inspect the seed he sown in the lovely home he gives. He inquires of Eglah and her religious tendencies. Noel advises him to let the child pick her own way to peace. From the day he first sees her he opens the empty temple of his heart.

"TO HELP HIM EVEN IN TRIFLES IS MY LIFE."

F course, Mr. Herriott, you are vastly amused by my ambitious pretension."

"Why Mr. Herriott? And why assume amusement which I certainly have not expressed?"

"Not verbally; but I quite understand that look in your eyes, when by sheer force of will you hold your lips from smiling. Only courtesy keeps in check your contempt for our 'higher education.'"

"Eglah, be a little more just in your generalizations. If the education be really 'higher' and thorough, no reasonable man could afford to disparage it. You have spent the morning over volumes of tedious statistics, extracting figures on ad valorem and 'specific' schedules that only a custom-house clerk or a tariff expert could utilize by eliminating non-essentials and compiling valuable tables. Why waste this perfect day over metric puzzles—dekameter, hectoliter, myriagram?"

"Father wished the exact figures, and to work for him is my greatest pleasure."

"Do not confound motive and accomplishment. Your father's secretary would have collected the statistics in half the time and in a more satisfactory form, simply because he has been trained for such search, as dogs are taught to hunt truffles."

"Mr. Metcalf was needed in Washington, and as father has tried me sufficiently to trust the accuracy of my work, he asked me to make this investigation while I was in New York. Mr. Noel, to help him even in trifles is my very life; he is my world, my all."

Mr. Herriott lifted his hat and bowed.

"Your devotion is beautiful and sacred, and Judge Kent should feel proud of the list of rivals he so successfully defies. Perhaps it has not yet occurred to him that in chaining yourself to his library desk you are restricted to sawdust diet."

I should become a different person, and shed my girlish ideas as serpents slip their skins; but since the 'onen sesame,' and I have 'arrived,' I seem to have lost nothing of the past, and my old, tiresome self is tyrannous as ever."

"Is social life in Washington disappointing?"

"That is scarcely the right term. Life is certainly very brilliant, and gay and panoramic, and I enjoy nusic and dancing, and some dinner parties; above all, I find keen plensure in following a spirited debate in the House, or listening to speeches in the Senate, but sometimes I catch myself wondering if this is indeed all—the veritable kennel of society, politics, diplomacy, or merely the shell partly cracked. not seem so absolutely real as it was at nome at Nutwood."

They were driving in Central Park, and Eglah shared the front seat of the trap where Mr. Herroitt held the reins of his spirited horses, and brought them down to a steady, rapid trot. It was a cold but sunny day in February, and as he laced his way in and out of the stream of vehicles, he and his companion were the theme of much comment from the passing throng. Fastidious in the matter of clothes, he was always remarkably well dressed, and at the two fashionable clubs to which he belonged he was penerally regarded "as all around, the best looking member." The dark steel-blue gray eyes—with no hint of yellow—which his Scotch father gave him, lost something of their penetrating brilliance under the long jet lashes that, with black brows and thick clustering hair, his mother had contributed, and his naturally clear olive had contributed, and his naturally clear olive skin had been weather-tanned in various cli-mates to a browner tint. In profile his face resembled a bronze medallion, and when he smiled his well-cut lips, that in repose seemed ominously thin, showed curves of rare beauty around a faultless set of teeth.

Gowned in a fur-trimmed cloth of hunter's green, Eglah wore a velvet toque of same hue, that failed to conceal the mass of golder. that 'failed to conceal the mass of golden-brown hair burnished by sunshine into the similitude of a white-oak leaf dyed in nutumn. By the accepted canons of art and cultured taste her form and features had been adjudged "beautiful," and some great-grandmother of the far South had downered her with a peculiar grace of movement, —not languid, nor sinuous, nor Delsartian—a natural idiosyncrasy that made the manner of her steps, the lifting of head and motion of hands, unlike other women's. Only one gift—most potent of all—had been withheld from her birthright: she was absolutely devoid of personal magnetism, and her habitual cold some unclassified heast whose method of of personal magnetism, and her habitual cold indifference approached haughtiness, that the world resented.

Sudden congestion in the line of equipages, stretching far ahead, had caused a temporary halt, and when the knot dissolved, and the impatient horses sprang forward once more, Eglah said:

Arr. Noel, had you any special reason for absenting yourself? CHAPTER VII.

"BY WHAT RIGHT DO YOU TOUCH GIFTS BROUGHT TO HIM?"

In a quiet and unfrequented cross street—equally remote from the thronged thorough-fares of trade and from fashionable avenues lined with palaces—stood the low and unpretentious Chapel of St. Hyacinth, marked by neither spire nor belfry. The old stone front receded sufficiently from the pavement to permit a short flight of shallow steps that led to an arched door in a pillared portico with a cross on its pointed roof, which hung over the entrance like a sullen, frowning brow. A northeast wind came fitfully in hissing blasts, dashed with nne sleet; but when Eglah passed through the swinging inner door a warm atmosphere spiced with resinous incense infolded her as in a fragrant mist through which glimmosphere spiced with resinous incense infolded her as in a fragrant mist through which glimmered brass lattice screens, rows of tall candles, the gilded carving of the white altar, laden with lilies, and the marble statue of the Virgin, at whose snowy feet a red light burned in a silver lamp. On each side of the wall below the brass lattice that barred the chancel was a "confessional" of dark wood surmounted by a cross, and the clustered lights in the center of the concave ceiling formed in the center of the concave ceiling formed

On the right and left of the altar the white surpliced choristers filled several seats, and the quivering thunder of the organ ceased suddenly, as if to listen to the marvellous voice of the boy soloist, that swelled and rose as if the singer felt himself "hard by the gates of heaven." A slender child of ten years, graspirahis music with waxen hands almost infantile in size, while his head, covered thickly with shining ripoles of golden hair, was thrown back, and his blue eyes almost purplish, like a periwinkle, were raised in contemplation of the crown glowing above him. The colorless face was delicate and beautiful as if wrought out of ivory, and a certain pathetic sadness of expression inherent in fragile childhood was for the moment dominated by the radiant exultation of his wonderful eyes, that seemed made to dwell between the wings of a scraph. he had knelt in prayer, and advancing to the steps of the chancel, stood with one hand on the prass railing and briefly explained his unexthe brass railing and briefly explained his unexpected presence. A telegram had summoned to rector of St. Hyacinth's to the deathbed of his father, and the request to officiate in his absence had been received too late to permit the preparation of a regular sermon; hence the patient indulgence of the congregation was invoked for some desultory remarks which might not prove entirely fruitless. After a few exordial sentences, he repeated slowly the orening ten verses from St. John xv.

vine," said our Lord, "and ye, my brethren, are the branches." "

Then followed a recitative of various selected passages from the "Sermon in the Hospital," in tones so musical and liquid, and with a repose of manner so profound, yet full of subtle magnetism, that his audience gazed in sympathetic wonder at the slight figure clad in the somber habit of his order—at the thin, pallid spiritual face where large, deep-set black eyes burned with the preternatural light of consecrated but consuming zeal. The folded arms attempted no gestures—what need, while that rhythmic wave of sound flowed on?—until the end, when the clasped hands were lifted in final appeal:

". . . the Cross of Christ the Cross of Christ Is more to us than all His miracles.

Thou wilt not see the face nor feel the hand. Only the cruel crushing of the feet When through the bitter night the Lord comes

To tread the winepress. Not by sight, but faith.

Endure, endure—be faithful to the end."

Unconscious of his movement, and irresistibly drawn, the young soloist sitting in the front row of choristers had risen, and leaning far forward, looked up into the face of the priest like one mesmerized, his parted lips trembling in a passion of ecstasy. Then the organ boomed, and the boy fell from paradise and joined the choristers chanting as they marched away behind the uplifted cross.

"Yes. Fra I go himself could scarcely have been more impressive when he talked to the sick and dying on hospital cots. To my cousin Vernon this world is only a hospital of sick souls. Mrs. St. Clair, I should like to meet souls. Mrs. St. Clair, I should like to meet that little boy who sang so beautifully. Can you help me?"

"Very easily. Come back with me now to the vestry and we may find him. Did you notice how that lovely boy seemed almost hypnotized?"

turned toward the rear stairway leading to the street, Mrs. St. Clair exclaimed:
"Mr. De Graffenried, stop the boys! We want to see the soloist. Call him back."
"Madam, I think he is still in the chancel."

Lifting the velvet curtain that concealed the altar from their view, she beckoned Eglah to her side.

Father Temple had been detained by one of the church-wardens, and as he turned to hasten away the boy, standing near, caught the black skirt of the priest.

"Please, sir, may I speak to you?"

"Certainly. I am glad to be able to thank you for the music today. Your solo gave me great pleasure."

"I could have done better, but my throat is sore; it bled just now. I told nobody, because I am the only one who can reach that high C, and so I tried not to fail. I want to ask you how I can learn all the wordz you spoke? Oh, if I could, I would set them to a chant; they would lift my heart out of me if I could sing them."

Father Temple took his tablets from an inside pocket and made an entry.
"Where do you live?"
"Oh, a long way off. Far down in East—Street: but, please sir, if you would leave the poetry here. I could get it at next rehearsal."
"My little man, how do you know it is poetry? The words do not rhyme."
"Rhyme? I do not understand that word—but I feel poetry. I always know it by the way my blood beats, and the little shiver that runs down my back, and the joy that makes me cry sometimes."

runs down my back, and the joy that makes me cry sometimes."

"I will send you a printed copy, in care of the rector. Dear child, God has given you a wonderfully sweet voice, and I am glad you use it in His service."

He laid his thin hand on the boy's golden head, and smiled down into the wistful blue eyes, where tears glistened.

The childish fingers, holding two snowy spikes of Roman hyacinth, were lifted and placed on the priest's hand, pressing it timidly against his curls.

"Thank you, sir. Please take these. They smell like the heavenly gardens, and I have mothing else to give."

"Were they not on the altar?"

"Yes, I slipped out two from the cluster there."

"Then they belong to God. By what right do you touch sacred gifts brought to Him?"

"They were mine. I bought them last night and laid them yonder when I came today—and God can spare just two, when I have nothing else to pay you with. Did you—oh! did you think I—stole—them?" A sob shook him. and tears followed.

Father Temple stooped and drew the little white-robed form to him, pressing the head against his breast.

"Forgive me, I did not quite understand: and I am sure the dear Father knows what is in your grateful heart. God bless you and keep you. I shall put the hyacinths between the leaves of my Bible."

Eglah stretched an arm across Mrs. St. Clair's shoulder and dropped the curtain.
"Come away. Some other time I may talk to him, not now."

The following day Eglah returned to Washington and two hours before the departure of the train she drove to Twenty-third Street, where she and Mrs. Mitchell usually made their purchases of damask, ribbon and lace. While the latter bent over boxes of wools and crochet cottons, Eglah seated herself at the handkerchief counter. When she had selected the desired number, the saleswoman filled out her index sheet and rapped sharply with her pencil.

"Cash! Here, cash!"

"Cash! Here, cash!"

Several minutes elapsed.

"These cash boys are so tiresome. Cash, cash! I had to report one last week. Cash—here he comes at last. Now do hurry up; you are a regular snail."

In the boy who hastened away Eglah recognized the soloist of St. Hyacinth's, and noticed a bandage around his throat. When he came back with the parcel and counted the change into the palm of the saleswoman, Eglah touched his arm.

"I heard you sing yesterday, and want to tell you how much I liked your voice."

"Thank you, ma'am, I—"

"A spell of coughing interrupted, and she noticed how wan and weary he looked, and how heavy were the grayish shadows under his lovely eyes.

"Will you tell me her name, and where she

At this instant the floor-walker strode forward, and a frightened expression crossed the boy's white face as he turned quickly, but Eglah laid a detaining hand on his head as, rising, she confronted the floor-walker.

"If he loitered it is not his fault; I kept him. If he missed a call I am to blame. Good by, Leighton; shake hands. When I comeback to New York I hope to hear you sing again at St. Hyacinth's; and if I miss you here, I shall buy elsewhere."

His hot fingers quivered in her clasp, and, pressing a folded bill into his hand, she joined her foster-mother and left the store.

"What a frail, beautiful boy, and what genuine golden hair! Looks as if it had been dipped in a pot of gilt. Dearie, don't you think it a shame these young children are chained up in stores when they ought to be romping and playing ball?"

"Come with us, Mr. Noel, we have ample room. Yes, it is early; but of course at the last minute I must needs shop on the way." As he scated himself in the carriage he handed a package to Eglah. As their carriage turned from Twenty-third

The debate of the Harvester Trust Bill arrives, and the battle between ambition and conscience ends with victory for the latter. With the defeat of the bill goes Corcoran's hopes of a lifetime. He will ruin Warfield if he sends his soul to perdition. Victoria pleads. "Would you not spare him, Michael, for my sake?" Corcoran's wife dies. Gene goes home. The baby grows worse. Victoria refuses to stay with her child. It dies, and Gene pleads to let the little one in death unite them. She is unworthy. Gene discovers a note written by Corcoran, and Victoria admits her love for him. Gene thrusts the note into the heart of the flame and taking off the wedding ring tells Victoria she is free.

Gene returns to New Hampshire. He sees footsteps in the snow and meets Theta. Is there no chance for a reconciliation with his wife? Has he done right in setting her free? rom those parched lips.
Victoria started as she felt a light touch on her hand.

"Sister, what are you doing here?" It was the figure in black who spoke.

At the first kind words she had heard for many months a quivering seized Victoria.

"You call me sister—me! Do you know what I have done—what I have been?"

"I neither know—nor care," the other answered. "It is enough for me that you are suffering, and in distress—and I wish to aid you. I heard you call yourself 'an outcast' just now. Remember—Christ loved all the fallen ones."

There was infinite pity, infinite tenderness in the words.

As they fell upon ears attuned only to harsh sounds a long sigh came from Victoria, then as a new burst of laughter floated out some of the old fire came into her eyes as she pointed with shaking finger to the room beyond.

"Do you see that man sitting there—the one who is holding aloft the wineglass? That is the man who dragged me down and turned away. God in heaven, how I loved him! I spent my soul in loving him! I gave up a position in plainly the effects of a life given over to the gratification of every delight.

The prince had previously met Corcoran abroad and when on his arrival he tucked his arm familiarly into that of his host and the two walked into the great banqueting hall together, the elite of Excelsior smiled approval.

Outside in the shadows a woman crouched. As the wintry wind swept down in a flurry of snow she drew her faded garments about her and came closer to the window as if to draw from it a fictitious warmth. As the light fell upon her ghastly face it would have been hard to recognize in the outcast standing there the woman whose beauty and distinction had once placed her among the leaders in the social life of Excelsior and Washington.

Within the great hall the merriment was at its height. Mine host was m fine fettle and told one of his most charming stories, and this the prince capped with his best bon-mot. Bursts of laughter floated out into the night. The royal visitor was unanimously considered a thorough democrat and a prince of good fellows.

The eyes of the crouching figure were fastened only upon Corcoran who occupied the place of honor opposite his guest, his face darkly flushed only upon Corcoran who occupied the place of honor opposite his guest, his face darkly flushed with wine. She looked until she could bear it no longer, then tossing back the Titian red hair, turned her white face to the bitter night sky while a cry of agony burst from her.

"Alone! abandoned! an outcast!" she moaned. "Nothing remains for me now but the river!"

Alone sheight. Mine host was m fine fettle and told one of his most charming stories, and this the prince capped with his best bon-mot. Bursts of laughter floated out into the night. The royal visitor was unanimously considered a thorough democrat and a prince of good fellows.

"You are not all bad," she said. "Down in the depths of your soul are the germs of good—we have need for such women as you. Listen! We are a little band of men and women devoting ourselves to the succoring of the oppressed, to lifting up the fallen. We have no church and our only creed is to do good. You have expressed a wish to come back to the ranks of respectability. You shall come. You have sympathy for the sinning and the suffering. There is noble work in the world for you. We have hospitals—your hands shall minister to the needs of the ill and dying. Let the dark river roll on—come with me and find peace."

A cry burst from Victoria.

"You would give this chance to me—to me?"

"Yes. Will you come?"

For answer Victoria went down on her knees in the snow and pressed the hem of the Sister's dark robe to her lips. When she arose there was a look of cestasy in her eyes. It was as though some light from beyond this world had filled her soul. Then the two went forth together—the gentle Sister—and Victoria—an outcast no longer.

Inside the banquet hall another scene was taking place. The feast was ended and Corcoran had arisen to propose a final toast.
"Your Royal Highness," he began, then stopped short, a strange expression passing over his face. He tried to speak again but the words ended in a jumble of unmenning sounds.
The guests looked at each other in astonishment. Could it be that this was some practical joke their host was attempting to play upon them? There was nothing feigned about those

I loved him so well that had he been poor I would have gathered the his sworn promise to wed me if once I were fire he kept putting me off from time to time. After my divorce we went abroad. It was a year of mingled hell and heaven. Shall I ever forget the day I met one of my old friends in a picture gallery in Rome? At school she had been my dearest friend and when I saw the scorn and loathing on her face—how I suffered!

CHAPTER XV.

PAYING THE PRICE.

IGHTS were flashing in the Corcoran mansion; a chain of richly clad people was circulating past the receiving line and being steered by liveried attendants into gorgeous rooms where hothouse flowers were diffusing their fragrance on the warm air. It was winter outside, and not far away beings were freezing—and starving. The glant plant of the Harvester Trust lay ide, while gaunt Labor and Capital locked in a death grapple.

A prince of the blood was touring the country and had chosen to honor Excelsior with his presence. Who so fitting as Corcoran to entertain the royal guest?

As he towered there above the heads of all the others, Corcoran was as huge and massive in frame as ever, but the face with its purfy look and the cruel smile on the sensual lips showed disorder and the guests dispersed. In frightened groups the servants clustered about the entrance ways or cast fearful glances at the deserted banquet-room.

Later the announcement was made that Corcoran might die at a moment's warning, or that he might live for years.

In any case his power for evil was ended. If he lived at all it would be as a helpless paralytic, dependent for the supplying of every want upon the caprice of hirelings.

CHAPTER XVI.

A MISUNDERSTANDING.

Theta shook off Warfield's arms as though they were fire, and white, tense, quivering she faced him. faced him.

"You had no right—no right—what you have done is despicable," she blazed out at him. Then she turned and swiftly mounted the path. Surprise, pain, anger and love were all mingled in Theta's mind. In that moment she knew she still loved this man and the knowledge was terrible to her. She was bitterly angry with herself and no less angry with him.

Gene mentally anathematized himself for his folly.

Gene mentally anathematized himself for his folly.

"How pitiably weak I am where she is concerned," he thought. "Now my impulsiveness has spoiled all." When they reached the crest of the rise he drew near to her.

"Will you forgive me, Theta? As you say, my act was despicable, and yet it seemed to me I had a right. You have assumed the relation of a daughter to my mother and sprely there is no harm in a man kissing his sister."

"Now you are laughing at me," she cried more thoroughly angry than ever. This way of putting the case did not mollify her in the least.

"Indeed I am not, Theta. As this is a first offense can't you let me off this time if I protalise not to repeat it?"

She hurried on without making any reply. Gene swiftly overtook her and blocking the narrow path caught both her hands and held her so she could not pass.

"Theta," he cried desperately, "I can't let you go till you tell me you forgive me."

She struggled to free herself but he held her gently but firmly, and at last she desisted.

"You are stronger than I -you can hold me here all night but I will never say I forgive you." The words struck him like a blow in the face.

here all night but I will never say I forgive you." The words struck him like a blow in the face.

"Then go! you woman of ice! You were always such!" he said cruelly, and suddenly released her.

Theta pressed her hand to her heart as if to stop its wild pulsations. He called her a woman of ice-he! When every pulse in her body had thrilled at the touch of his hands and that kiss was still scorching her lips! With a strong effort of will she regained her composure.

"I think we have been acting like a couple of foolish children," she said with a quick change of manner. "Look—there is the house glimmering through the trees. We must hurry." And hastily as if at any cost she would cut short the time of being alone with him she led the way nomeward.

As they entered the maple walk Mrs. Warfield was standing on the porch, her short sighted eyes peering into the dusk.

"Theta, dear, you are late tonight," she called out. "Did you have to stay after school with some of those naughty scholars?"

A tall figure sprang out of the shadows and the next moment strong arms closed about her and her gray head was pillowed on a manly breast.

"Mother! Dear little mother! Don't you

"Mother! Dear little mother! Don't you know me?"
"My son!" When the two presently came into the sitting-room their faces were transfigured with joy. At that moment Uncle John entered and greeted Gene heartily. Maggie welcomed him vociferously and then pretended to be greatly shocked when he hugged her. She went out quickly, beckoning frantically to Theta.
"Sure, Miss Theta," she said as the latter followed her into the kitchen, "there's not wan blessed thing in the house fit for Master Gene to ate, and what am I to do, at all, at all?" Theta laughed a little at Maggie's anxious tone.

"Sure, and wan blessed thing in the house fit for Master Gene to ate, and what am I to do, at all, at all?" Theta laughed a little at Maggle's anxious tone.

"I should think, Maggle, that what is good enough for the rest of us ought to be good enough for him." And with this small bit of consolation she went away to her own room where she brushed out her bright hair until it shone like silk and then donned a becoming pink waist, hating herself all the while for the innate femininity that could not resist making these changes in her toilet.

"You foolish gir!" she said, addressing the pretty reflection in the glass.

When the family entered the dining-room half an hour later the table fairly groaned beneath the weight of good things Maggle had ransacked cellar and storeroom to find.

Uncle John laughed as he helped the plates from his end of the table.

"Maggle must have been daffy," he remarked. "Here we have peaches served in no less than five different ways. She must have thought you were hungry for peaches, Gene!"

"I am, said the latter, doing full justice to the bountiful spread. "I was always fond of peaches, and," he added, slyly, "anything that looks like peaches."

Uncle John gave Theta a pinch under cover of the table, but the girl never lifted her eyes which seemed fastened upon her plate.

The old gentleman kept the conversational ball rolling merrily, and Gene, too, was in a happy mood and felt, in the joy of his homecoming, a return of the oldtime boylish ebullition of good spirits. Mrs. Warfield said little merely beaming upon all. Hers was a joy too deep for words. Theta alone remained silent, and after supper she would have slipped quietly away had not Uncle John detained her.

"You mustn't go, Theta, till we've had a song or two."

"Please excuse me tonight, Uncle John. I don't feel like singing."

"Nonsense. Ye know the old adage: 'A bird that can sing and won't sing'—" and he led her to the piano.

On the impulse of the moment Theta sang Newman's "Lead Kindly Light."

A moment before there ha to take up the duties that I have left undone." Gene said none of these things and when the song was finished merely contented himself with looking his appreciation.

Theta kissed Mrs. Warfield, gave Uncle John an affectionate pat as she passed him and then held out her hand to Gene. He gently pressed it and she gave him a cool "good night."

Mrs. Warfield looked a little anxious.

"I wonder what has come over Theta?" she thought. "It's unlike her to act this way."

"The plano is an acquisition," said Gene.

"Yes, it belongs jointly to Theta and me," said Uncle John smilling. "It represents the prize money we received for our Holsteins at the Cattle Fair. It takes us to win the blue ribbons. Theta is one of the best judges of thoroughbreds in the county, and ye'd be surprised, Gene, if ye knew the amount of practical information there is tucked away in her pretty head. What she doesn't know about soils and sub-soils and the rotation of crops isn't worth knowing. Since she has been here we have advised together and I've been going in for scientific farming. And I tell ye it has paid. The oid farm was never in better shape than it is today, and now that ye've come home to take charge I can turn it all over to ye with a clear conscience—"

"But I haven't come home to take charge of things," interrupted Gene. "You surely don't think of retiring?"

Uncle John arose and stretched himself before the fire. He was not so tall but was broader than Gene and he was hale and hearty in spite of his sixty years.

"Why, no, I haven't thought of it, but as long as ye've come home—"

"You'd be miserable if you did." said Mrs. Warfield and then turning to Gene added: "But I hoped you had come home to settle down on (continued on home to settle down on

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Although a stranger to all of you, I have long been both a reader and a warm friend of our dear "Comfort." There is not a page from "cover to cover" that isn't filled with the best of interesting matter.

The superiority of the paper combined with the small price contribute to make it a general favorite with all. Comfort's editor is "the right man in the right place," and I will leave it to those who read it, and know, to say that it has brightened and cheered many hours of its many thousands of readers that would otherwise have been sad and lonely. The world seems brighter and better for its very existence.

I do not see how anyone can do without it; certainly they cannot after once having it a visitor in the home. My health has been very bad the past five years, and not being able to do much work, I spend a great deal of time reading; so you see I am one of those who can rightly appreciate "Comfort," can hardly wait for the time to roll 'round for its monthly visit, and only wish it were weekly instead.

I have one dear son, and two sweet little girls have done all my work for the past five years. The older one being thereby deprived of the benefit of an education, to wait on and care for "Mother."

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

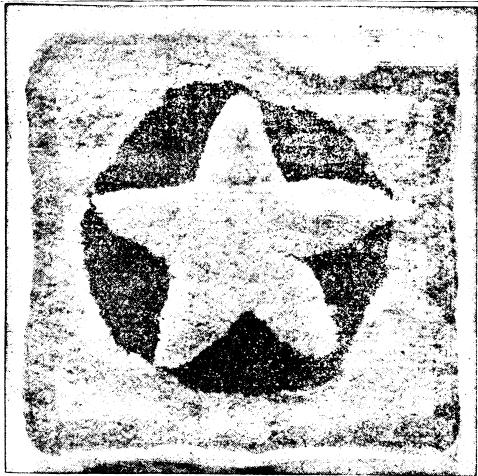

How many of the sisters' sewing machines get stiff and refuse to work properly? A good remedy for this is to take coal oil (kerosene), and soak your machine well with this, in all the places where you oil, in fact all over the working parts of the machine, let stand over night, and next day take a basin with kerosene and acrub all parts well, then take a piece of absorbent cotton or a soft piece of cheesecloth and wipe all parts clean, oil well with a good machine oil and your machine will be in good running order.

Now let me tell you how I made a postal card screen. If one already has a screen begin to decorate as soon as you have postals enough to make one row across the top, then as they accumulate add another row.

Or one can make a screen as I did, of pieces of wood one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the crosspieces I have of one inch square by five feet tall, the cross to the slow of the strength of the strength of the strength opposite slit, across to the slit in the next card, etc., and fasten at the end of the row.

I also made a spool tabourette, for which one will need from rods the height of the tabourette you wish to make; these can usually be obtained at a hardware store, have a thread put on both ends of each rod and a nut to fit. Next have boards cut into the shape and size you wish (mine is clover leaf), and in each corner of the boards have a square hole made to fit the nut into, also cut a hole in the bottom of one spoo

Take a square of cloth fifteen by fifteen inches. In the center of this draw a circle in which trace a star, having the points each about two and one half inches high. The background and star are of pink and the circle dark green. Two skeins of pink wool will be needed and one of green, also a pair of sharp scissors and steel crochet hook, number five or seven. The wool is drawn through, from the wrong side, with the crochet hook, make each loop about one half an inch long and place the loops close together. After the design is fully worked in, clip off evenly with the scissors and the work will have the appearance of velvet, be close and thick and wear indefinitely.

their infancy—how I longed to see them grow up to become possessors of a good education, and to realize that it is my poor health that has prevented.

If the dear sisters could see them, how patiently and willingly they have made the sacrifice—how eager they are to do everything they can, they would know I have much to be thankful for. In my sorrow and sympathy for my children concerning their educational hindrance, I found some comfort in reading the following lines by Emily H. Watson:

Thou may'st deck thy form with utmost grace, In shimmering silks and costly lace; Like the light gazelle thy figure be, Thy manner, case and courtesy: In mental strength thou may'st excel, And deepest wisdom in thee dwell; May'st have acquired a knowledge rare, In science skilled, an artist fair.

Yet know, a kindly heart is more Than all this seeming goodly store; And gentleness is nobler far Than intellect and beauty are. She who the highest praise would win, Must be all-beautiful within; Then, mind and body shall unfold Their radiance from a heart of gold!

Their radiance from a heart of gold!

Although our Heavenly Father knoweth best, and why, yet it is hard for us sometimes to see the "sliver lining" of the cloud.

I am going to ask that some of the sisters will send magazines, papers, or any reading matter, or any little souvenir to pass away the lonely hours. I would be pleased if some of those living on the coast would send me little tokens of the sea with letters accompanying.

Did any of the sisters ever try putting a teaspoonful or more of baking soda in fruit jars, fill about half full of water (not too hot), shake well and emoty? If any bad odor remains repeat as before and rinse in cold water.

Napkins and tablecloths stained by tea or coffee may be restored by plunging into fairly strong ammonia water.

Try using a clean dry cob to remove mud splashes on your dress skirts. This will not roughen the material.

than four years, but this is my first letter.

My daughter and I have just returned from a horseback ride. I enjoy the exercise but do not get much time for it.

Here in North Dakota we have moderately warm summers, with beautiful cool nights, so one can enjoy a refreshing sleep.

We have some lovely wild flowers from early spring to late fall. First of all come the crocuses, then we have a very pretty red lily, which resembles the tiger lily that blooms in July. We have wild raspberries in the Turtle mountains and wild plums and gooseberries at Devils lake. I was at the Turtle mountains the summer of '05. There were fourteen of us who went. We canned what berries we got up there. There are many pretty lakes on and around the mountains. We camed what berries we got up there. There are many pretty lakes on and around the mountains. We camed hist above one. I have not seen a river since we have lived in North Dakota. We raise all kinds of grain such as wheat, oats, barley, speltz, flax and macaroni wheat, but wheat is most extensively grown.

How many of the sisters keep house plants? Will someone kindly tell me how to have success with house roses? Mine lived for a month or two and then died.

My little girl is past three years old. She can spell quite a number of words and speak several pieces. Do any of the sisters think it makes a child's hair heavier to keep it cut short for a few years? I cut my daughter's hair twice last summer, and would cut it again if I thought it would be best. I am interested in all kinds of fancy work but as I am a busy farmer's wife have little time to devote to it.

DEAR READERS:

I inclose a few of my favorite and tested recipes. I would dearly love to have all of you try them, and then sometime in the future tell me how you liked them, especially the oatmeal cookies. I think they are fine if one gets them baked just right.

Mrs. Gertie Hamilton, Willow, Okla. I received the Sept. number of Comfour you sent me. Thank you.

Thank you.

Mrs. W. C. Eason, Phoenix City, Ala. I like Mrs. W. C. Eason, Phænix City, Ala. I like poetry very much.
Mrs. M. E. Ward, W. Canaan, N. H. Your headache cure has proved helpful to me.
Mrs. Ethel Noakes, Box 104, Cutler, Ind. We have just tried your way of sugar curing pork, and I do hope we will like it.
I noticed the Deer tidy, sent in by Miss Mamie L. Poole, and worked a sofa pillow in cross-stitch. I enjoy doing all kinds of fancy work. I am glad to know that some of the sisters wrote and remembered Mrs. Fannie Henson. In a letter to me she writes:

"I feel almost like a new creature, and thank God and ask His blessing on all who have remembered me in the time of my affliction."

I notice different ones have expressed their ideas about giving practical help and many of them are good.

Let us all often read Proverbs 21-13, "Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard."

How many of you know that there are thirty-one verses in the twenty-first chapter of Proverbs, and that you can pick out a verse for your husband's and son's birthday; and the same number of verses will be found in the thirty-first chapter for the sisters, for there is a verse for each day of the month.

If any of you should accidentally become strangled remember to hold up your left arm and you will be relieved at once.

Mrs. E. S. Dalton, Albany, Mo. I sent you a block of bleached muslin at your request, and wrote you a lefter, and it was sent from there to Kansas City, and then sent back to me, in nearly three months from the time I sent it. I am afraid others I have sent have been lost. Mrs. J. C. Flippin, Wallowa, Oregon.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

It is very warm today (July) and dry. It seems as if the grass and all other vegetation, is burning up, fast as it can. It is queer why rainfall is so frequent and heavy in some parts of the country, and none at all for months in other parts, but we continue to hope, and pray for rain.

As the cotton season will soon be here again. I would ask the sisters, to whom I could not send any bolls last winter, to write me, also those that wish mistietoe and I will be glad to send either. I would also like to hear from some of the sisters, who know how to prepare appetizing dishes from shell fish, such as shrimps, lobsters and crabs, either canned or fresh. I had a tiny booklet, containing recipes for such but have lost it, and never could obtain another.

How many of you are interested in Cacti, Aloes, Agaves, and Euphorbias, also Haworthias? Those are truly the busy (or lazy?) woman's plants, some of them are very odd, and beautiful requiring so little care, thriving with the grossest neglect.

I love the beautiful Rex and fancy-leaved Regonias, also the fancy-leaved Caladiums. I have had numberless sorts, but unfortunately lost them all, by moving and illness, but I hope to obtain a rare collection of them again, some day, not far distant.

Mrs. E. R. Behrens, Brady, Tex.

Some day, not far distant.

Dear Editor:

With your permission I would like to answer those who have asked me about this place and state. We are not the barbarians that some people think we are. This state has four distinct seasons. In the northwest have a little spell of zero weather every winter, the rest of the year is pleasant. We have the rich and poor, good and bad people. If money is the chief thing with you, go to the bottoms and raise cotton, corn, rice, hay and starch. If you want church and school advantages go to the town. If you want a pleasant home with church, school and a living, but don't expect to get rich quick, come to this place, that is if you have energy, no place for drones. We have the State University and Experiment Station, three public schools, nine churches, no saloons, one opera house, three railroads, 6,000 inhabitants. Most neighborhoods have church, and school part of the year in the country. This part of the state raises apples, strawberries, cherries, peaches, pears and chickens mostly for money, some grain and starch. Some folks have good health, some would not be well anywhere in this world.

I believe it would add years to the comfort of the afflicted if we would all avoid speaking of our aches and pains. Look up not down, look out not in, think more of God and other people, and less about self. I seldom go out of my home, but am doing my best to be brave, why should I not, when I have a boy that is a perfect treasure. Mothers, begin to teach your children how to serve God and humanity from the time that they can receive an impression. Don't impose on them nor let them impose on you—start fair, reason with them, never countenance an unfair deal that they may make, no matter how shrewd it may look, teach them to tell the truth at all cost.

Dear shut-ins. I wish I could help you all.

I am a COMFORT reader and I have never seen a letter in print from this part of Virginia. We think the COMFORT a fine paper and thoroughly enjoy it all, especially the Sisters' Corner.

we think the composer a me paper and thoroughly enjoy it all, especially the Sisters' Corner.

I am nineteen years old, am five feet nine and one half inches tall and weigh one hundred and thirty-five pounds. I, like many of the young sisters, am not afraid of work, mother having always taught us to help. Mother is a school teacher and in the winter I stay home and keep house, while she teaches school. I have a grandmother, mother and two sisters. My father has been dead for eight years, my oldest sister is married and has a dear little baby eight months old.

How many of the sisters ever attended a camp meeting? We have one about eight miles from us, which is situated between the Rappahannock and Potomac rivers and is named Marvin Grove Camp. We have a cottage there and go every year to spend the entire ten days, and enjoy very much the religious services as well as the social part. I live in the country and although I have never lived in a city. I have visited there and I think I much prefer country life. We are staunch Methodists.

100 many of our younger sisters like the embroider? I have shadow embroidered a shirtwaist for myself and am now working one in the eyelet embroidery. I like the work very much.

I saw in one of the Comforts where Mrs. J. W. Welch, Downings, Va., sent to one of the sisters for Hardanger patterns. This dear, young lady passed to her reward one year ago. She left a mother, husband and little son to mourn their loss.

I would be delighted to hear from any of the sisters; especially any near my age.

I find many interesting things in your helpful corner. My home is nestled among the picturesque hills and mountains of sumny East Termessee, "Way down South in dear old Dixie, where the cotton blossoms grow."

Greenville, Tenn. is our county site, and was also the home of Ex-President Andrew Johnson. He is buried near the city, and his monument seems to kiss the sunny sky.

My heart goes out in sympathy to the dear shut-ins. I think each sister should write to them and inclose a postage stamp, if no more. Now let's each send a mite to them, and see how happy it will make them.

cTOBER is here and three quarters of the year has vamoosed down the plug hole of time. Just size up, figure up, and weigh up, now that you've reached the three quarter mile post of the annual race, whether you've lived the year right, and if you haven't, start right in now to make amends in the last quarter. For instance, I have had one hair on my head for the last nine months, and I'm going to try to have two before Christmas, even if I have to bite the one I have in halves and plant it beside the other half. Billy the goat has eaten one freight train since January but hopes to get outside at least half a dozen more before the turkey season sets in. So you see we are doing our level best to set you a good example and it's up to you to follow suit. If you can't follow with an entire suit, follow with at least a pair of pants. If you can't follow with even that amount of clothing you'd better stay home.

Honestly though, joking apart, try and make some kind of a record for yourself, before the year passes and skidoos forever. Before you can realize it, the year will be gone and at least half of you are going to waste it. I can tell that by your letters. Please don't do it. Here are a few ways you boys can improve yourselves and the world at large: Cut out cigarette smoking. It weakens your heart, ruins your nervous system, and makes you physical and moral degenerates, and puts you in a graveyard to fertilize grass and make a free lunch for worms. If you must smoke, get a pipe and smoke only in the evenings. Cut out cigars are only stink sticks and an abomination.

Newport News, Va., Aug. 5, 1907.

Dear Uncle Charlie:
Newport News, my home city, is situated on Hampton Roads at the mouth of the James river. It is named after Capt. Newport. It was here at Newport News that the early settlers first sighted Lord Delaware's ships in 1610, when they brought the much needed supplies that saved the colony. In Hampton Roads the first battle between iron-clad ships was fought.

Newport News has only been a city for eleven years but it has a population of 28,749 persons. We have one of the finest harbors in the world and can accommodate the largest ships affoat. So to any of my cousins who like water sports I extend a hearty invitation to visit the city on the James.

Now, I'll stop lecturing and get down to business.

of your statements. You say the President's yacht steamed up the roads. Honestly you don't expect us to believe that, do you? I never knew ships could steam around on dry land, and I for one just can't and won't believe it, rude though it is to doubt a lady. Another thing I'd like to know. Why did those blooming English Johnny Bulls come chasing over here in 1607? Why didn't they stay at home? "America for the Americans" is my battle cry, and I think those Johnnies had an awful nerve butting in over here. What right had they, coming here interfering with us any way? If I'd been President in 1607 I'd have had Congress pass a law to have kept them out, and I'd have sent Admiral Dewey with the whole American fleet to see the order was carried out. Those Britishers had a nerve invading our country any way. We didn't want them. I wonder our Immigration Commissioners ever allowed 'em to land.

Another thing I can't believe: You say 'em to land.

'em to land.

Another thing I can't believe: You say you have a plant at Newport News that covers one hundred and twenty acres of ground. I saw a cabbage once that was nine feet from its nose to its shoetops, but that's nothing to a plant with a half a mile of water front and spreading over one hundred and twenty acres. I shouldn't like to have to prepare a plant that size for the cook pot. Another thing. You say the warships peeled their thunder. Now honestly Eva, I don't think a warship could peel a potato, let alone a good healthy noisy thunder. Never mind, Eva, you've written a dandy letter and deserve our heartfelt thanks and gratitude for giving us a free trip to the exposition. free trip to the exposition.

Our next letter is an admirable one. Read it and take its splendid lesson to heart.

Cousin Will, I am glad you have mentioned the subject of kindness to animals, as that is one of the things this League has sworn to promote, but I am sorry to say that this subject, which is of tremendous importance, is seldom, if ever, discussed in any of the letters that come to me. I think I'll make it a rule to publish no letter unless it contains a record of one act of kindness to our dumb friends. I know your letter will do a lot of good, and I thank you for your kindness to the poor patient beasts who contribute so much to our welfare and happiness. What a glorious example the animals set us in many things. You never saw an animal drunk with liquor. You don't have to preach temperance and make prohibition laws for animals, for they know when they've had enough, which is more than the human animal knows. A dog will stick by a man when he's penniless and in rags. All the juicy meat bones in the world won't tempt a faithful old doggie from his starving master. How many of your human friends stick to you when you're down and out? Not one, except it be a devoted old mother. Some animals are capable of infinitely more love and devotion than human beings. With them it's true till death and they ask no return but a kind word and a little petting. Will, you speak of animals "following" you. I can tell you scores of instances where animals have also followed me. I had a bear follow me up a tree once, and when I called or tried to call on my best girl last night, the bulldog followed me right home. That dog got quite attached to me before we parted. It took a crowbar and a club to loosen the attachment as he had attached himself to the seat of my pants. 'That laugh belied the words that he uttered.

"Bah!" he said, "you are talking folly! A mystery, and you will unravel it? Well, my friend, proceed to unravel it as soon as you get ready."

And, turning upon his heel without further ceremony, he left the room and began descending the stairs.

"Yer let him off too easy, Mr. Straight," said Dave. "Say, sha'n't I go after him an' help him down ter der street!"

"No, no," said Ralph hastily. "Stay where you are."

"No, no," said Ralph hastily. "Stay where you are."
"I wouldn't mind givin' him one in der neck meself, jes' fer luck," said Madge. "S'pose I go after him?"
"Nonsense!" said Ralph. "Ah, there's the whistle! Get back to your work, Dave; I'm afraid you've missed you'r lunch."
"Oh, dat's nothin'," said Dave, slouching off; but he was hungry, nevertheless.
"Wait a minute, Madge," said Ralph, when he, his sister and our heroine were left alone. "Are you sure you have heard the name of Shirley Everton before?"
"Dead sure," returned Madge positively.
"And from your mother's lips?"
"Never heard it nowhere else."
"That is strange. What could she have known of Shirley Everton?"
"Dunno, Mr. Ralph. But he must have been a friend o' hers, for she spoke a good deal about him."
"Can you remember anything that she said?"
"Not exactly, but I know she allers spoke o' him as if he was dead. Maybe it wasn't the same man at all. Mr. Raiph—on, it comments have been." said Ralph Straight, meditatively. "Well, go back to the folding-room, Madge: we will speak of this again tonight." They did speak of it again that evening, when the labor of the day was done, and they all—Ralph, his sister, his mother and Madge—sat together in the cozy little parlor of the flat, but they could arrive at no conclusion—how could they?—and the subject was at last dropped.

how could they?—and the subject was at last dropped.

"I feel convinced," said Ralph, "that, as I said to Mr. Everton, there is some mystery in all this, and I am going to try to find out what it is. But there is something else that I want to speak to you about, Madge."

"What is it?" asked the girl, with wideopen eyes. "Nothin' hain't gone wrong wid my work, has it?"

"No, no, your work is all right; but—but

Ralph paused, and his face flushed.
He hardly knew how to express his thoughts in a way that would not offend Madge.
The girl belped him out.
"I t'ink I know what yer wanter say, Mr. Ralph."

"I t'ink I know what yer wanter say, Mr. Ralph."
"You do?"
"You do?"
"I guess I do, anyhow. Oh, I ain't no fool, an' I b'lieve in speakin' right out when dere's anyt'ng ter be said. I don't talk like you an' Miss Alice, an yer kinder 'shamed o' me, nin't dat it?"
"Not exactly ashamed, Madge," began hlalph: "but——"
"Dat is it, den," interrupted Madge. "Well. I t'ought so. Don't never be 'fraid ter say jest what yer mean ter me, Mr. Ralph. "Well, that was our bargain," admitted Everton.
"Of course it was."
"But the girl has not been put out of the way."
"How do you know?" inquired Harold, sharply.
"All ready," returned the driver in a low tone.
"Yes, you have, and you've opened your mouth once or twice too often, too. Oh, don't weary, some bright and happy, began to troop out of the great bindery.

"But—"

"J:st so. But, owing to your own stupidity—excuse me, dear boy—the business has got to be hurried a little. By your unlucky and ill-timed visit to the bindery you put yourself in a very unpleasant position. You said just enough to arouse the suspicions of Ralph Straight—who is no fool—and he has been trying to yank the skeleton out of the closet for the last fortnight. I think he is beginning to be discouraged now, but we ought to get to work, all the same."

"Well. then," asked Everton petulantly, "why don't you get to work?"

"I'm going to, my dear boy, but be patient—be patient."

"You intend to dispose of the girl?"

sister, studiously watched every movement. She was an apt pupil, and she soon began to improve.

Instead of "dat" she said "that;" she substituted "the" for "der;" she eliminated all the slang she could detect from her conversation, and although her grammar was by no means faultless, her natural refinement asserted itself, and a very decided improvement was manifest.

Every evening the little family—Ralph, his mother, his sister, and Madge—met and discussed current topics, and it e untutored, but enthusiastic girl listened eagerly to the discussions that were provoked, and sometimes spoke—usually to the point, though not always elegantly.

In these evening conversations Shirley Everton was sometimes spoken of, but after a time the interest that his singular visit to the bindery had excited began to grow less, and his name was mentioned with less frequency. Ralph Straight, in his few leisure moments, had made some inquiries as to the mysterious connection between the millionaire and the humble, illiterate mother of Madge Mason, but had gained no information.

How could he?

What chance has worth in a contest with wealth—mind in a struggle with millions?

"Now quiet down; lugs are thrown away on me."

"Well," said Everton after a brief silence, during which he seemed to be struggling with some strong internal emotion, "I can't see what good this girl's death is going to do me, after all."

"Can't you?"

"1. I shall still be an illegitimate son in the eyes of the aw. Whether she lives or dies my position is the same."

"True. But it will be a deal safer after she's dead."

"Humph!"

"Oh, there's no sense in sneering about it; it's just as I say. With her out of the way who is there to dispute your claim to the estate?"

"You." How could he?
What chance has worth in a contest with wealth—mind in a struggle with millions?
But during this time the mind of Shirley Everton was by no means easy.
He had heard nothing of Richard Harold for two weeks, and his mental condition was decidedly uncomfortable when one evening Tompkins entered his room and announced:
"That—er—gentleman who was here on the night of the big ball, sir, is waiting to see you again."

you again."
"Where is he?" asked Everton hoarsely.

"Where is he?" asked Everton noarsely.
"In the reception-room, sir."
"Tell him I'll be with him in a minute."
After taking a liberal drink from a black bottle that he kept in his desk, Everton descended to the reception-room, where Harold greeted him with:
"Ah, there! How goes it, old man?"

CHAPTER VIII.

HAROLD AT WORK.

Everton drew back haughtily. His visitor's familiarity annoyed, offended him.

"Mr. Harold, I believe?" he said.

"Well, you believe right, old boy." said Harold, who was evidently a trifle "tipsy."

"I am Mr. Harold—otherwise Richard Harold, otherwise Dick Harold, otherwise etcetera, etcetera. Call me anything you please; but let's get down to business."

Everton maintained his frosty demeanor. He had prepared himself for this interview, which he knew must come sooner or later.

"Yes," interrupted Harold, "we did. I agreed to put the girl, Madge Mason, out of the way for a consideration—isn't that right?"
"Hush!" interposed Everton. "Not so loud!" loud

"Humph! Make it forty-eight."
"Forty-eight, then."
"Done!"

'If what?'

As Madge Mason stepped upon the pavement the driver gave a quick, sharp tap upon the window.

Instantly the lady threw open the door of the vehicle and stepped out.

Approaching Madge Mason, she said:

"May I have a few words with you, my dear?"

Her face was so pleasant, her manner so prepossessing, that Madge replied at once: "Yes, ma'am. What is it?" "Have you ever heard of the Hand and Heart Society?"

"Have you ever heard of the Hand and Heart Society?"

Madge never had, for the simple reason that no such society existed; so she replied in the negative.

"Well," said the sweet-faced lady, "it is a society for improving the condition of young working girls. I am its president, and this is the night of its monthly dinner. On these occasions I usually go about to places like this bindery and select some bright-faced young girl as my guest at the dinner. Your face attracted me; will you go with me?"

Madge hesitated.

"I—I ain't dressed fit," she said.

"You are dressed as well as any of the girls, my dear. But if you like we will stop at your home before we go to the dinner and give you an opportunity to 'fix up' a little."

"All right, ma'am," said Madge.

"All right, ma'am," said Madge.

"You will go?"

"Yes'm."

"Then step into the carriage."

Reflecting that she could tell Ralph and his sister all about her proposed evening's entertainment as soon as she got home (for they had preceded her), she stepped into the coupe.

Scarcely had she done so when the window shades were pulled down.

A peculiar, subtile odor permeated the vehicle, and Madge sunk back unconscious.

Winter Eggs

HE best way to explain the necessity for certain ingredients in the winter bill of fare is to give you, in a condensed and simple form, the chemical analysis of the egg:

Water, 650 grains: albuminoids, 80 grains; oil fat, 130 grains; mineral matter, 9 grains; sugar coloring matter, 26 grains.

The remaining hundred parts of the thousand constituting an egg, are used in the makeup of the shell, consisting of fifty grains of salts of lime, twenty grains of uncombined lime (calcium oxide), the remainder being carbonic acid, water o ferystallization.

Perhans a brief explanation of even this simple analysis may prove useful. Albuminoids are the flesh-forming parts of food usually referred to as nitrogenous. Oil, fat, etc., are merged under the heading of carbon necessary for warmth. Mineral matter consists of lime, soda, potash, magnesia, sulphur, etc. It must not be imagined that my endeavors to explain the food analysis is a reflection on your intelligence or power of comprehension. It is prompted entirely by the contorted condition of most of the reading matter in nearly all the published books. Close reading of this matter used to leave my poor brain in a very hazy, muzzy condition, when I began to study cause and effect, practically, in poultry culture. Experience, however, taught me the common sense of much that, at first, seemed theoretical terms; so, after reading and digesting various authorities, a notebook was compiled for my own use, containing the gist of each article in the simplest terms possible to convey the information. During the last thirteen years practical tests of the value and benefit to be derived from each individual item has been made. When, as occasionally happened, a statement did not prove true, it was cut out: now I flatter myself there is little left in the book which is not "tested, tried, and true" worth your close attention, for it will save you much groping in a wrong direction. Knowing the material necessary to make the egg, no one ought to be foolish enough to expect Biddy to meal and milk unskimmed.

Mineral matter, lime, soda, potash, magnesia, sulphur, are principally formed by the action of digestion in reducing the matter containing these ingredients to ash. The usual troubles assailing poultry on most farms come from the feeding of only one of these elements; poor Biddy has to stuff herself all flesh, and no warmth, or all fat and no flesh. Kill a bird that has been fed on corn only, and it will be heavy with layers of internal fat, but showing a very poor depth of breast meat. Balancing rations by trying to equalize flesh, fat (warmth), and mineral is not a very hard proposition when the values of even a flesh, fat (warmth), and mineral is not a very hard proposition when the values of even a few grains and plants are realized.

Having read so far, you will now realize that clover hay, linseed meal, bran, wheat, oats, beef scrans and skimmed milk contain practically all the equivalents of summer foods; the addition therefore of corn, buckwheat or rye in cold weather are safe and simple, if given only as warmth-makers. Never allow the proportion to exceed what is needed allow the proportion to exceed what is needed for that purpose, or fat will be made and stored, neutralizing all your care. In other words, the hen fed on corn only, in order to accumulate the ten parts of flesh and twenty parts of fat needed for the egg, will be compelled to acquire fifty parts more fat than she requires.

Green bone and water now alone remain for consideration. The former is beyond Green bone and water now alone remain for consideration. The former is beyond doubt the best of egg foods qualifying as it does in nearly all the needed elements. Many farmers scoff at the idea of having to pay for a mill to cut up bone for chickens, yet the same men will not grudge a hay cutter for Lee horse and cow. Green bone means fresh bone from the butcher, which can be bought for about two cents a pound. The mill to grind it ranges from eight to fifteen dollars. It contains the natural meat, juices, blood, gristle, oil and mineral matter in soluble condition which renders it easy of digestion, especially for birds. Almost all the components for eggs—white, yolk, and shell,—in the most concentrated form possible. So, if eggs are to be profitable, the bone mill must be kept going. When it is impossible to obtain the green or fresh bone, the ground, sold especially for poultry, can be used, though it is not half as satisfactory because the grinding process it has to submit to before grinding, leaves little but the phosphate of lime and earthy matter which clover and bran furnish in better form. At least half the egg is composed of water, surely a sufficient reason for impressing the importance of a generous supply accessible at all times in clean dishes of a proper temperature, cool in summer and the chill off in winter. The foregoing will enable those who want to make up combinations from the materials at hand which will include the necessary elements, to select for themselves.

Bees

Nearly all the winter losses can be traced to starvation. See that each colony has an abundance of well sealed stores.

If the beehives are in an exposed place, try edging up some boards at their backs; or get up a few bundles of fodder before winter rightly sets in. Lots of things are not attended to at all, simply because they cannot be done in a shipshape manner.

Do not try to winter your bees too warm. They need access of air from the bottom.

Liquid honey syrup should not be given to bees in winter for food. At this time they are not able to evaporate the excessive water from it. Iney should have been supplied with food in the autumn. But, as a last resort, take a cupful of liquid honey and work into it all the powdered sugar it will readily absorb; make the dough into the form of a pancake, and lay it on the brood frames directly over the cluster of bees; cover up warm and leave until spring. Then feed, for stimulative brood-rearing, liquid honey or sugar syrup.

Bees will winter better in a double-walled hive, north of latitude forty. A single-walled hive will do very well, providing a hood, say six to eight inches deep, is used instead of a flat cover.

Deep hives are very much better for t'e

flat cover.

Deep hives are very much better for t'e bees to winter in than are the shallow ones; but, if the hives are made too deep, very little surplus honey, will be secured. Many beemen, including myself, now use two bodies at certain times of the season, removing one just at the beginning of the main honey flow, and putting on the section boxes. The idea is to keep the whole working force of the colony together, and crowd them into the section boxes.

boxes.

Many of remember the old method of keeping bees in box hives for breeders, all ving them to swarm, then putting the swarms into other hives and depending on them for our surplus honey. In the fall of the year the swarms were brimstoned and the hivs roused of their honey; after which they were stored away to be used again the next year.

A. F. D.—Keeps a great many rabbits and asks the following questions: Which are the most profitable to raise as a business, Belgian hares or fancy rabbits? (2) Do black, black and white, or blue and white rabbits sell as fancy rabbits? (3) Can you tell me whether there is a paper printed called the Animal World? (4) I have a Belgian hare that has a swelling on the left side of the face, between the eye and nose, and runs down to his upper lip; there is a white matter running from his eye. He makes a wheezy noise when he eats. I bought him three months ago. He seemed all right, but three days after I had him, he jumped out of the box I had him in. When I caught him, his face was cut open where the swelling now is, and he had bled a good deal. I keep him in an open box with four half-grown rabbits, which are healthy. I feed grass, corn and oats ground together, and a small piece of bread twice a day.

A.—Much depends on your market. If you have space to keep Belgians in large quantities, and can supply general produce markets, and money to buy stock, they are undoubtedly profitable. Keeping only a few white rabbits or anyone of the fancy breeds would pay better. (2) The ordinary mixed colors sell as pets, when young, for about fifteen cents each; black and white, and blue and white, when true to the Dutch marking, are among the best of fancy rabbits. (3) I should imagine the buck got some dirt into the cut, which has caused an abscess to form. Bathe the face with lukewarm water, then apply carbolated vaseline; repeat this treatment every day until all matter and swelling has disappeared. You should not keep a buck in a hutch with half-grown rabbits; put him in a place by himself. Do you give salt in the feed twice a week, or in the drinking water? If not, neglect it no longer, or at least put a lump of rock salt in the hutch. Instead of ground feed all the time, use whole oats. Gather a few oak-leaves and acorns, and put them in his house; he is sure to nibble them and they are one of the best nat one of the best natural tonics for all rabbits.

S. G. S.—I have a new disease among my chickens, and my neighbors are anxious to have me ask you about it. The first was a half-grown bird, and I thought, when first looking at it, that its back was injured. It could hardly stand up. I put it in a little storeroom. It seemed very hungry and pecked at its food rapidly but never got a crumb! I put food in its mouth and it swallowed. The next morning there were eight similarly affected; all young chicks. In a day or two some hens commenced. In all I lost about thirty. Some had slight diarrhea; others, not any. They lived a long time after being taken sick and seemed to die from exhaustion; their combs were red until they died. I dissected one, but couldn't see anything.

from exhaustion; their combs were red until they died. I dissected one, but couldn't see anything.

A.—I should imagine there must be some form of indigestion and liver trouble running riot among your chickens, and, as it affects young and old alike, there must be some easily found cause for it. If the birds are on free range, a ripening wheat or barley field may be answerable for over-feeding; new grain is dangerous. Lime or strong fertilizers will attract poultry and is an enlargement of the food passage just before it reaches the gizzard, and is seldom met except in connection with an attack of inflammation of the crop—overfeeding will cause such a complication. I once lost a lot of chickens with just such symptoms as you describe. After much trouble we traced the cause to a leakage in the kitchen sink drain, which allowed a small quantity of all the water emptied, to run out onto the ground about two feet from the house. It was spring cleaning time and a quantity of washing-powder and strong soap had been in use. If you can trace the trouble with your poultry to some such cause, boil rice and give them the water to drink. Feed a light mash which has been moistened with clover tea. Half a teaspoonful of castor-oil when you first notice anything wrong would help to clean the intestines.

A.—It is very profitable to caponize young roosters, and the work is best done when about three months old. You will require a set of instruments and a few lessons from an experienced operator. I could not advise your undertaking this branch of poultry-raising unless you have a specially good market for expensive goods, and have already mastered the business of feeding for table. Being a woman alone, my advice is to devote your energies to building up a good flock of laying hens, as eggs are always in demand. Late hatches should be started in August or September, which will give you broilers by Christmas. December and January are the best montas to hatch for the early summer broiler.

Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

DEAR COMFORT BOYS:

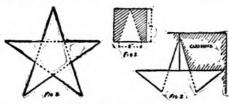

Hurry Scurry

"Hurry Scurry" is the apt name of an indoor game that for its kind yields as much harmless fun as any I know of. Place a number of chairs, one less than there are players, in a room as compactly as possible, and then all retire to the adjoining room except one person. He is called the captain and begins to read or sing slowly. Suddenly he comes to an abrupt stop and each player runs helter-skelter for a chair. The one who is disappointed drops out of the game and takes a chair with him. This is kept up until there is only one person left. The contest is interesting all through, but between the last two it is almost hair raising.

Drawing a Star

It is often necessary in various mechanical jobs to be able to draw a five pointed star. If you try it with ordinary tools I think you will find it quite impossible to draw a star which has uniform angles and lines. Now, if we analyze the figure we will find that it is composed of five triangles, and as anyone can draw a triangle we are in a fair way to master the difficulty. The best way to go about it is to cut out a pasteboard pattern as shown in Fig. 1, and use it five times. The accompanying drawings make the method very plain.

Simple Coin Trick

Ask one of the company if he will accept a dime and upon receiving an affirmative answer show him the coin and press it in his open palm with a thumb that has been previously dipped in wax. Then quickly withdraw your thumb with the dime adhering to it and close the other person's hand. He will be most certain that the coin is still in his hand, for the sensation produced by the pressing will remain. Tell him he is at perfect liberty to keep it and upon opening his hand he will find to his intense astonishment that it has vanished. If you now show him the same coin you will still further mystify him.

Paper balloons are a source of much amusereper balloons are a source of much amuse-ment to the outdoor boy. The common para-chute is easily made of a piece of tissue paper, tied with two strings from corner to corner, knotted where they cross. Throw the hanging weight into the air just as you would a ball and the parachute will open and float slowly trates this idea. Two slots that coincide are cut in the rim to let the line feed in and out. Knot the line to the center of the reel, close the can just as you would close any tin box, and wind up as you wind a tape line.

Creating Smoke

Tell the company present that you can easily fill two bottles with smoke without any matches, fuel or any inflammable substance. When some one dares you to do it, get two common bottles which you have secretly prepared by rinsing one with spirits of salt and the other with ammonia. Put the mouths of the two bottles together and the two invisible exhalations will be converted into a white vapor which will immediately fill them like thick smoke.

Coin Trick

Here's a neat little trick that any one can perform without practice or apparatus. Balance a common playing card upon the tip of the left forefinger and place a penny on it directly over the finger. Now tell the company that you propose to remove the card without disturbing the coin. It looks very difficult and of course some one will say that you cannot do it. It is accomplished by snapping the end of the card with end of the second finger of the right hand.

You will find all this interesting and I hope to give you next month, some very new ideas, that are to surpass anything we have had. Good bye until November.

Your Uncle John.

struck me, and struck me hard, that you could help me out in this matter. Of course I don't know how rich your cows are, but probably they have several millions of dollars saved up, they have several millions of dollars saved up, and surely they wouldn't mind letting me have a small sum on excellent insecurity for about ninety years. Touch 'em for a ten spot first, and send it by express or money order. Two rich lady cows ought to be able to do that much for a man when he's pressed for money. I'm sure I'd do as much for them. If they needed the loan and I had the bucks, I'd come across with the dust. If they won't ante up with the Lasumas, tell me where these rich cows keep their wads and I'll see if I can break into their safety deposit vaults, and get next to a bunch of their long green. I don't see why cows should be rich when I'm poor, and so I've put the matter up to you, and you interview the Rockefeller cows and see if you can't get them to pony up a bunch of their real dough to tide me over till the reubens nest again. again.

Mt. Vernon, Wash., Jan. 15, 1907.

Dear Uncle Charlie and Cousins:

I was sweet sixteen last Nov., and you must know I feel big. I have gray eyes, light brown hair, fair complexion, am five feet eight inches tall, weigh nearly two hundred pounds. Get over a little farther, kids, this is not enough room for me. I hope you did not get washed out during the flood, I came near it. I was in Stanwood at the time. The sidewalks were all afloat, a railroad bridge was washed out between Stanwood and Mt. Vernon and the trains could not run. The wagon bridge over the Skagit river in West Mt. Vernon was washed out. One man got killed. He was the husband of one of my cousins.

I went to a play party last Saturday night, never got back till half past two o'clock Sunday morning. Had a swell time.

Say, Uncle Charlie, I am going to ask what you will say is a foolish question, but I am in earnest. Why don't they train girls to be soldiers? I would go in a minute! I don't know that this great country of ours would ever need any more soldiers than they have, but we could learn to use arms, and protect our homes, in case of an attack. How many of the cousins, that is the girls, are willing to go? I expect you will all say "no" so we will drop the subject.

Clara, you have gray eyes, eh? I'm sorry to hear your eyes are turning gray at such an to the ground. A more ambitious effort is the paper balloon made of long, narrow curved sections, like Fig 1. Eleven is enough, if you cut and lap uniformly as shown in Fig. 2. A mixture of flour and water is used for paste. The top circular piece, Fig 3, can be put in last. Place a small candle or oil dampened sponge in the bottom hoop, light it and the hot air will soon inflate the balloon and cause it to float into the air, when you can watch it for hours.

Lightning Calculation

Lightning Calculation

To multiply any number that contains two figures, that is, one that is more than ten and less than one hundred, by eleven, all you have to do is to add the digit together and place their sum between the two figures or digits. Example: 52 x 11 equals 572. We find it by adding 5 and 2 together and placing their sum 7 between the two figures themselves, namely 5 and 2. If the sum of the two figures exceed 9 the left-hand figure must be increased 1, thus 48 x 11 equals 528. Practice this rule till you understand it thoroughly, you will find it very convenient in your schoolwork and in real life too.

Fishline Reel*

The tothe ground. A more ambitious effort is the party yers, each of hear your eyes are turning gray at such an early age. I trust your hair is holding out, and showing no signs of following suit. I was not washed out during the flood. I twas nearly afforward outside, but I have not been washed out since I interviewed a doctor and a swell time once, and I never want another. The cook in a boarding house that I used to reside in, tried to commit suicide. She put half a ton of rough on rats in a cup of coffee, and before she could drink it, the waitress picked it in the ock in, tried to commit suicide. Of course if the other country had would make their enemies succumb without a murmur. Of course if the other country had women soldiers, too, things would be different. If ever two regiments of women soldiers, too, things would be the dandiest hair pulling time that ever happened. Gee, but that would rather go up against a dozen Maxim guns than tackle an angry female with a hat pin. I have been there and I know. As regards the use of arms, Clara, I don't think anyone could give the women pointers on that. You will remember that directly you were ababy in arms, and able to put up a pretty good fight I have no doubt. A sweet young gazelle-eyed blondine peach once gave me a lesson in arms I shall never forget. She put two of the fairest, dimpled, whitest embracers you ever saw around my frazzled sove neck, and I thought I was the whole cheese factory. I did not know that one of those peachy arms was reaching for my pocketbook, and the other was digging out my pocketbook, and the other was digging out my ninety-eight cent Ingersoll, but they were. When I came out of my trance I discovered I was shy a dollar and eleven cents, three pawn tickets, and a tooth brush that has been in our family four hundred years, a steel gold watch and two bone collar buttons. Oh, no Clara, it is not necessary to teach girls the use of arms, they can all use 'em, and when they get through using 'em, a poor man has not got much left, except a little experience and a good-sized grouch. and a good-sized grouch.

All the cousins are anxious to have me print more pottery from the League "Pots", and as I believe in encouraging the work of budding genius, I have much pleasure in submitting the following letter and poem from one of our sublimest "Pots".

one of our sublimest "Pots".

RAYMOND, WASH., July 15, 1907.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I live six miles from the city of Raymond, in the woods where the birds and squarrels only sing to me. I am employed in a logging camp where they log with engines. I am nineteen years of age and six feet tall, weigh one hundred and eighty pounds. Have brown eyes and dark hair. My father has a ranch about three miles from where I am employed. The country is very fine in Summer but bad in winter.

I am a great lover of music but don't like to dance. There are no girls in this country. They are very scarce.

dance. There are no girls in this country. They are very scarce.

All the cousins may write to me I will tell them how we put logs in the river with our steam engines, the girls especially, are sure to get an answer from me soon.

Now Uncle, if you ever come to Washington bring me a sweetheart and I assure you I will get you a job in our logging camp.

And another thing I am a great song writer and I will write you all kinds of pretty songs and poets. So don't forget my pleadings, Uncle. I will write you one song for a sample.

True Love

There is a young maiden sitting on a small bench under a apple tree,
And she is a wating for someone.
Ear now she hears a step behind her
And she tearns here loving head around
And there by her side stands a young youth.

CHORUS.

Yes we are two true Lovers, ditto ditto ditto And some day we shall join our hands together fore ever and ever.

He is a handsome young boy though, And he has a small farm by a river Tis the spot where I love to be with him Cause he is so kind and gentle to me. And Oh how I do love him Though some day I shall be his wife, And he will be my husband for ever.

CHORUS.

Now this is my sample song and I wish to see all in print.

As this is my first time to join your circle, I will close my letter now. Wishing to hear from some of the cousins, I am yours (author)

JOE JAVORSKY (No. 16,199).

from some of the cousins, I am yours (author)
Joe, you were certainly inspired when you wrote the appallingly beautiful lyric above. I should think it was easy to write pottery when the "squarrels" sing, but alas, I never saw a squarrel, let alone heard one sing. Toby says he thinks a squarrel is the mother-in-law of a squirrel and that they sing through their ears once every seven years. As to this I am not competent to speak, but I should think you must have had the assistance of a good many squarrels when you wrote your medal winning love lyric. You have chosen a beautiful title for your pottery. "True Love" is an inspiring subject, and you have certainly handled it in masterly style. You have five lines in your first spasm, and none of them rhyme, and all differ as to length. So you have violated every poetic rule but that doesn't matter. A Pot can't have his fiery soul held down by mere rules, and then maybe the squarrels got in their fine work, and the rhymes got up and skiddooed to the tall grass. The last line of the first verse is sublime. "And there by her side stands a young youth". Joe, I am glad you told us that he was a young youth for we'd have had a fit if he had been an old youth. You also say the young lady was "wating" for someone. Now, I've never seen a lady "wat". Can a young lady stand on the "wat" question. Yours chorus too, is Honest Injun, Joe, you've got us all guessing on the "wat" question. Yours chorus too, is fine. But how can we sing the second line? Surely you don't expect us to sing, "Yes we are two true lovers, ditto, ditto, ditto". That would sound dreadful. Now let me tell you how I would have written that first verse and chorus. Please note that my lines rhyme, and and that the rhythm and metre are correct.

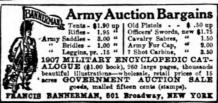

There was a young maiden, she sat 'neath a tree, When a whopping big apple flopped down on her knee.

There was a young maiden, she sat 'neath a tree, When a whopping big apple flopped down on her knee, And she gazed at that apple with joy and delight, Then she opened her mouth and took a big bite. CHORUS.

But that apple was green,-oh, that apple was green, And an agonized look on her fair face was seen. For no sooner had she, that green apple bit oh! Than she had a pain in her ditto, ditto, ditto.

Joe, you might have the lover ride up on a gasolene chow chow, with a doctor and save her life, and win her for his very own hash chopper and button sewer for life. In your chorus, you say the lovers are going to join hands for ever and ever. That would never do, Joe. Think of the predicament he'd be in if a skeeter bit him in the middle of the back and he couldn't jar loose to scratch himself in a hurry. How would she be able to fill her face with pork and beans, with her hands tied up forever and ever? Your (CONTINUED ON PAGE 11.)

MISS NANNIE HAYS, Box 9, Jearoldstown, R. D., 3, Tenn.

My Dears:

Those of us that live where the maple trees grow are certainly enjoying the beautiful changing foliage. Make the most of the outdoor life during this time. Our August number of dear old Comporer was full of good things. The barrel-shaped hat-pin holder was too cute for anything, I think I shall manufacture about six of them for Christmas, then the paper-napkin ribbon box, and some of those crocheted belts. Girls, get out your materials, crochet hooks and go to work, crocheting them of cream white with ribbon of the same color, and for those that can embroider there is the dolly. We should all be experts at all of this fancy work, as Mrs. Wilkinson has been instructing us for so long. Then the letters in our corner. I amproud of Comfort. I get many complimentary letters from our friends all over the continent, and one from my boy Hy Stanley. God bless him!

Hurrah for Florida and for Mrs. Ennis, and her neighbor, Mrs. Winchell. I certainly hope Mrs. E. you may get the entire fifty subscribers for the best paper printed for the money, I am goling down this winter for some of that Saurkraut.

At last girls you have the Salt Rising and Buttermilk Bread that I promised you long ago, but I suppose our Comfort people had to have a rest during the summer, and furthermore probably thought you had all better buy baker's bread during the heated term, which was certainly very sensible. I know I bought it.

I am going to send right off for "Take me back to Dixie," the chorus is fine; the last strain is the air of "Old Folks at Home." I like it. "Elaine." Someone wants Elaine to call him back, so they can kiss and make up. The song is worth a great deal, more than our Comfort people ask for it, let me tell you. "Silver Heels" was composed by Neil Moret and we all know what Neil's music is. "Fascination" is by W. C. Powell, as is "Elaine." Only think, anyone for the above can be had for getting a club of three subscriptons to our blessed old Comfort. Bot, have MY DEARS:

think of next I wonder? Is there anything we have not got in Comport? Now they are giving us another fine story by the talented writer, Mrs. Evans; the opening chapters are certainly promising.

Who said they thought "J. A. D." was a church of England woman?

Welcome Mrs. Haygood to our corner. Mrs. H. is an angel of goodness and mercy; many of our shut-ins pray for and bless her for her kindness and generosity.

Let me say to all those writing me bewalling their lives, their lot, their fortunes, many of them have made their beds and must lie in them. Circumstances have brought about some of the unhappy cases, but we must make the best of it. To wives, try to interest yourselves in your home duties, your work, your children, your husband's interests. Make them yours, help him. Do try to be cheerful, I know it is hard many times and goes against the grain, but we must do it, meet him with a smile, a kind word; if he moans, and groans over the hard work and times do not, whatever you do, sit down and join in, take the opposite side, try to show him that "things are brightening, the clouds are surely lifting, and from the experience of this year, we can do better next year." Now don't forget my advice; men have got to be encouraged, helped, held up, to a certain extent. Talk about women being the weaker vossel. I will warrant that nine out of ten of my women readers, practice just exactly what I have written here, they have to, or some men would go all to pleces if it were not for that good little patient woman at his side. Keep it up: it is the only thing to do, and will, to some who have written me, bring about peace and happiness it the home. One thing more. To the one writing me stating that "lilushand objects to my belonging to a club, as it takes me away from home too much. Often I am not at home when he comes in, and he does not like it." To that one I would advise drop the club. Perhaps husband would enjoy some good historical works, lectures on different subjects which you might read aloud evenings, for t on, now interly, longing for the chasp of a vanished hand," a word from those loving lips. Oh, wives be careful, be tender, be thoughtful, sow that ye may not reap tares.

To the educated girl returning to the dear old farm, do not think because you can read Latin and Greek, that you are above scrubbing the floor, and washing the dishes. Relieve the poor, tired, worn-out mother that, has stood at the helm all these years, give her a rest, take the reins in your hands, your educated hands, perhaps they can devise some means of lightening the burdens appertaining to the home. Brains, and education are not, and need not be wasted on a farm, the long winter evenings can be devoted to reading. By planning, having system, and management about your work you can find time to paint, and follow the instincts of your refined nature; it need not be lost, or wasted because you are on the farm, your place is with your parents, take my advice remain at home. If there were other children it would be different; your first duty is to them in my estimation.

Mrs. J. L. E. Your postal received on my birthday. Thanks.

Mrs. Gilbert. I wonder if you are our eldest subscriber? I shall long remember the 26th of August, as I felt honored in writing you so you would receive the letter upon that day. I am sure you appreciated the premium you received. Your words remind me of a hymn, the chorus of which is for my shut-in fund? God bless you whoever you are.

Mrs. Niocolas Collette. I really wish you had sent the dolly to someone else, as I have no time for that work. I shall try to comply with your request as soon as possible. Uncle Charlie's book of poems is all right, from start to finish. I am deased that you like it. Let us all remember that Comfor will make a welcome Christmas present to many of our friends, and then, besides, think of the prizes they are offering us. I hope the friend that wrote me about those medallion pictures has got some for her den. They are lovely, as are many other prizes they r.v. I know of many "St. Elmo's' that are to be given for Christmas gifts, the recipients of which will thank and bless Comfort for offering such a valuable prize.

Let the small boys get out those large pumpkins, cut out eyes, nose and mouth, insert a cande and put one on each gate post, for Hallow'een Eve. How spooky they will look.

N. B. Monday's for wealth, Tuesday's for health, Wednesday's the best day of all, Thursday's no day at all. June is the best month. Are you contemplating matrimony?

M. M. I am going to tell you about how to prevent those awful chilblains next month, if possible, for next winter they will trouble you, if I do not.

J. A. D. (Mrs. Van Dyke), Orange, Mass.

Dear Comfort Sisters:

I want to thank the many sisters for kindly remembering me through the month of May in honor of my boy's birthmonth. Some of the letters were full of sorrow, even greater than my own—some were full of gladness, but all were kind. One dear lady from the South sent me some Spanish moss and phosphate pebbles, others sent tracts, books and postal cards; one kind one sent just a verse or two which were appreciated. As a number signed no name I want to thank all for their kindness in remembering me. I have answered a few of the letters, as some sent stamps and I would have been glad to have answered all of them, but my purse would hardly allow so much for postage.

Frances C. Tucker. Many thanks for your kind letter, also the lovely poem. Sometime, we shall say, "God knew best." I will certainly pass the kindness along.

Mrs. James Nye. I do not think we belong to one another, for my husband's people were not English. Thank you for your kind words.

Mrs. Aurilla Alger. I thank you for the pansy sent in your letter, it certainly denotes true love, and that is what we all ought to have for one another.

Mrs. H. Fletcher. I regret you sprained your ankle. I hope you have completely recovered. Sometime I may write and tell you of myself and family as requested.

Miss L. M. Lebing. I wish I could see one of the rugs you have made. I should think they might be very durable.

Mrs. S. M. Sutton. Perhaps I can send you the lace later.

Miss May Pryor. Thank you for the pattern for the crocheted mitten. Do you want it back?

Miss May Pryor. Thank you for the pattern for the crocheted mitten. Do you want it back?

Mrs. Stella Fleenor. I too, love to read the Sisters' Corner. My children are, Ruth, thirteen; Ella, six. I will try to write to you sometime.

Miss Alice H. Blume. I thank you for your kind letter. I hope you will be successful in your nursing.

Mrs. R. umm. It certainly is a wonderful statue, "Not dead but sleepeth." What a blessed thought! Thank you for the remembrance.

Mrs. Agnes A. Fish. You sent beautiful verses, for it is comforting to know we shall see "them" again.

Besides these I have mentioned, I thank all who wrote extending their sympathy, each letter gave me comfort and encouragment.

As the sisters take such a kindly interest in each other I will ask you all to remember a neighbor of mine. Mr. Henry Albro, So. Coventry, Plne Knoll, Conn., a man of eighty-six years, whose left side is paralyzed from a shock, Letters would cheer and break the monotony of his life, and also that of his dear patient daughter who cares for him.

CHAPTER I.

JOB SEAGRAIN AND WIFE.

"Taint no use, Squire Peter," replied Job, meekly, as he looked blankly at his visitor; "I can't pay sixty-five dollars no more'n I can fly. I haven't got a dollar in my trousers' pocket."

"What's the reason you haven't?" demanded Squire Peter, savagely. "If you get a dollar you drink it up, and idle away your time till it is all gone. You have become a lazy, goodfor-nothing fellow! You are a nuisance to yourself, to your neighbors, and to your family!"

"What's the use of telking San't was he is the use of telking San't was he is seen as a suite of telking San't was he is the use of telking San't was he is the use of telking San't was he is the use of telking San't was he is the seen as he is the seen as

"I suppose it's no use; I have talked enough I suppose it's no use; I have tarked enough. I have coaxed you, and flattered you, and warned you, and now I have done something more, I have attached your place, and if you don't pay my debt, it shall be sold under the hammer."

hammer."

"That's rather hard, Squire Peter," suggested Job, with a painfully anxious expression on his face.

"Hard, is it? Do you think I'm going to find you in groceries and rum for nothing?" replied the indignant creditor, as he bestowed a withering sneer upon the weak debtor. "You have owned me sixty-five dollars and twenty-six cents for more than a year. I have dunned you and dunned you for it."

"I know you have, Squire Peter, and I'm much obliged to you for it," added Job.

"You have promised and promised to pay me."

"I know I have, Squire Peter, and I have

"I know I have, Squire Peter, and I have always meant to pay it."

"Why didn't you pay it, then?"

"Because I hain't had the money, Squire Peter—that is all."

"You might have paid some of it if you had had a mind to," growled the squire. "But instead of that," and the creditor waxed more indignant than ever as he spoke—"if you get a dollar, you pass by my door, and go over to Olgin's to spend it. You buy your rum and your groceries there now."

"That's because you won't trust me no more, Squire Peter," Job mildly explained.

"But I'm willing to sell you for cash, as Olgin does."

"He does trust me some."

"Not much: but he gets all your money."

"He does trust me some."
"Not much; but he gets all your money."
"He don't get much, for I hain't had hardly any money for a year. Oysters is mighty skeece this year."
"But they bring a high price for that reason. The trouble is, that you don't go after oysters."
"Tain't no use; I can't get none if I do."
"Why don't you go a fishing, then?"
"It don't pay."

"It don't pay."

"I suppose not," sneered Squire Peter. "You can do as you like now. If you don't pay my bill, I'll sell out your place just as soon as I can get judgment for my debt."

"It's rather hard for me to see you owing me sixty-five dollars and twenty-six cents, going by my steps to leave what money you can

"I won't do so no more," pleaded the meek oysterman. "I'll pay you every dollar I get, and let you trust me for all the rum I want to driph."

"I won't trust you for a penny," protested the squire. "This business has gone far enough. Now I'm going to get my money."

"But you won't turn me out of house and home—will you, Squire Peter?"

"Yes, I will. You had better go to Olgin, and get him to raise the money for you."

It was evident that Squire Peter Shiffletry was wounded beyond the amount of his debt; and it was vexatious to see a man that owed

"Do you suppose Olgin 'ill do it?" asked Job, with a gleam of hope.

"Do it! No, you simpleton!" replied the creditor, savagely. "After you have run up a bill of fifty dollars there, he will sell out your place if I don t. It's no use, Job; I want my money, and I'm going to have it this time. I have put the attachment on."
"You don't seem to have no attachment to me," groaned Job.

"I've got one now; and I'm not going to be a baby about it, either. I'm going to collect my bill. It's a bill I owe to myself and family to do so."

"I don't want you to sell the place, Squire

"I have attached the place, and I'm not going to back out now."

"The place won't fetch nothing, Squire Peter," sighed Job, with a tear in his eye.

"It isn't worth much."

"I know it, Squire Peter; but it's all I have in the world."

"Well, stir yourself, then. If you go to work, you can raise the money before I can get judgment. Do something. Make an effort. If you raise the money and pay the costs, you can save the place yet."

"I don't believe I can if you mean to be hard with me."

hard with me.'

"Get a mortgage on your house."
"My wife won't let me do that," replied Job. "I tried to do it once, and she smote me hip and thigh."
"Sell your boat, then. You don't use it much now. It will bring five hundred dollars."

lars."
"It's wuth five hundred of any man's money.
I love that boat better than I do——" he was going to say his wife, but he was afraid she might hear of the remark if he uttered it, and he checked himself—"than I do myself."

"It is a good boat, I dare say, and if you used it more, you could may your debts."
"I use it all I can. Oysters is mighty skeece, and fish don't pay."
"You ought to make that boy do something for you," added Squire Peter, glancing at a young man of sixteen or seveteen, who sat at the broken window of the room, reading a book.

book.
"He is willing to do all he can," answered

Job.
"He is a lazy fellow," said the hard creditor, sternly. "Why don't you go to work, Charlie, and help your father and mother out of trouble?"

The young man's eyes flashed as he laid his book on the window sill, and sprang to his feet.

"Help him out of trouble!" exclaimed he.

"Help him out of trouble!" exclaimed he.
"It was you who helped him into trouble."
"What do vou mean by that, you young rascal?" demanded Squire Peter, angrily.
"Haven't I begged and pleaded with you not to sell him any more rum?"
"That is none of your business."
"You have sold him rum till he is a sot, and now you are willing to take from him everything he has in the world."
"None of your impudence to me, Charlie."

"None of yours to me, either," replied the young man.

"Who are you, sir?" sneered Squire Peter.

"I'll let you know who I am if you don't let me alone!" replied Charlie, his eyes snapping as he gazed at the creditor of Job. "Do I owe you anything, Squire Peter?"

"You don't, but—"

You don't, but-"Then I don't want any of your chin music

"I don't earn any more money to pay rum bills with. I hope you will lose every dollar he owes you for rum. If you were a decent man, you wouldn't sell rum to a man when you see it is ruining him."

"You impudent puppy!"
"You are another."

"That's the whole story," added Squire Peter, who did not like the looks of the woman, and made a movement as to place himself between her and the open door.

"You whelp of misery!" she continued; and then indulged in a sensation pause.

"It isn't necessary to use any hard words, Mrs. Seagrain. It's a just debt, and I have tried for a long time to collect that bill."

"You imp of destruction!" added the lady.
"I on't care to be isulted. I've done my business here, and now I will go."

"You grasshopper of vengeance!" continued the stalwart woman, dextrously intercepting Squire Peter on his march to the door.

"I have nothing more to say," he replied.
"You locust of wrath!"

"We are all cussed now," groaned Job.
"You bad-smelling fish!"

"Mrs. Seagrain, I will not submit to this insolence," said Squire Peter, as he made an effort to reach the door.

"Hold still you sculpin of affliction!" per-solence," said Squire Peter, as he made an effort to reach the door.

"Hold still, you sculnin of affliction!" persisted the giantess, heading off the squire.
"You devil-fish of desolation! Look at that little man!" and she pointed at her trembling husband, crouching in the corner, behind the dilapidated cook stove. "Look at him, you cat-fish of crime!"
Squire Peter looked at him as requested.
"Haven't I ordered you not to sell that creature any rum, you rotten oyster of shame?"

"I've heard enough, Mrs. Seagrain. Busiess calls me in another direction."
"Did I ask you a question?" she demanded,

"I believe you did."
"Answer it, then! Haven't I ordered you not to sell rum to that creature, you green lobster of misery?"
"I think you did, but I sell what people want to buy."
"And now you want to reb that creature of

"And now you want to rob that creature of all he has in the world to pay his rum bill, you foul fish of desolation!"

The lady had evidently exhausted her vo-cabulary of epithets, and found it necessary to go through with the list again.

"It wasn't all for rum," pleaded Squire

"Most of it was, you putrid mackerel of cut of the cut of t

"Do you threaten me, Mrs. Seagrain?"

"No; I don't threaten you, but if you do "No; I don't threaten you, but if you do it, I'll scratch your eyes out! I'll crack the bones in your miserable skin, that's all!

Easy, easy; kinder easy, Charlie," interposed Job Seagrain, appalled and terrified at the bold speech of the youth.

"I speak only the truth; Squire Peter knows it and there," whethere is the property of th

"Don't be sassy to him, boy."

"He had better not be sassy to me, either. Job, I con't come here to be insulted," added Squire Peter, holding his head up very stiffly.

"If you came here to insult me, you had btter take yourself off," said Charlie. "If you call me a lazy fellow again, I'll put you out of the house."

"Kinder easy, Charlie," pleaded Job.
"I don't put any money into your pockets

Just at that moment the front door of the house was thrown wide open, and the form of Mrs. Betry Any Soggraphy delibered its reacted. house was thrown wide open, and the form of Mrs. Betsy Ann Seagrain darkened its portal. It was no insignificant form, either, for its flesh, blood, and bone would have turned the scale at two hundred and twenty-five pounds. Job was five feet high. There was a great deal of Mrs. Seagrain; she was a giant among women; and much as there was of her, it was unbapaily of work had quality.

"What's the matter now?" she demanded, with the air of one who felt she was mistress of the situation, however difficult it might Job Seagrain shrunk into a corner, and cowed like a terrified child. With fear and trembling he stole a glance at her, and then gazed stupidly on the floor. He did not ungazed stupidly on the floor. He did not undertake, in answer to the lady's question, to tell what the matter was now. He preserved a discreet silence, willing that anyone but himself should inform her in regard to the situation. Squire Peter Shiffletry took the duty upon himself, and briefly stated that he duty upon himself, and briefly stated that he had put an attachment upon the place, and in due time intended to have it sold to satisfy his claim.

"That's it, is it?" said Mrs. Betsy Ann Seagrain, planting herself before the creditor, with her lips compressed and her eyes glaring.

Job stole another terrified glance at her.

You may go now, you villain of wrath!"
Squire Peter Shiffletry availed himself of this permission, and departed without the formality of bidding the family adieu.

"Has it come to this?" said Mrs. Seagrain, as she went to the corner where poor Job was crouching, and taking him by the collar, dragged him out into the middle of the room. "Has it come to this?"

"Kinder easy, Betsy Ann," moaned Job, as the giantess shook him more roughly; "kinder easy. I'll do better now. I'll never drink another drop, Betsy Ann,"

"You've said that forty-nine times within a year, you useless little creature!" added the another drop, Betsy Ann."

"You've said that forty-nine times within a year, you useless little creature!" added the lady, as she again exerted a portion of her strength upon him.

"Kinder easy, Betsy Ann, I'll do better this time; I'll go right out now and borrow the money to pay Squire Peter."

"You little simpleton! Do you suppose anybody would lend you a dollar, even to save your carcass from putrefaction?"

"Yes, Olgin will lend me the money. Kinder easy, Betsy Ann," pleaded Job.

"Not he, unless you give him a mortgage on the house or the boat. No mortgage shall you give, for you would drink up the place and the boat in another year. It's a shame, you little fish of idleness! Here I've toiled and dug for twenty-one years for you, and now I'm to be sold out of house and home to pay your rum bills!"

Moved to wrath, as she thought of the miserable prospect before her, she shook poor Job till his bones rattled in his skin.

"Kinder easy," begged he, in pleading tones.

"Everything is kinder easy with you, and that what's the trouble. Kinder easy!" repeated she, as she actually tossed the unhappy man over on the floor; but she immediately picked him up again, and continued to discipline him, in spite of his earnest suppli-

"That's enough!" cried Charlie, indignantly.

"Now let him alone."

The young man was on his feet, with his fists clinched. Mrs. Seagrain did not desist, and did not notice the remarks of the boy. He evidently "meant business;" for grasping one of her stout arms, he attempted to release her hold upon the unfortunate victim of her wrath. If he accomplished nothing more at first, he succeeded in distracting her attention.

tion.
"Let him alone!" cried Charlie, in loud and firm tones; "I've seen enough of this sort of thing."

"What do you mean, you little puppy?"
said Mrs. Seagrain, while she gazed with astonishment at the bold youth, who had never before attempted to interfere in the family quarrel, of which he had often been a witness.

"You shall not knock the old man about in that sort of shape any more," replied Charlie.
"Did you say that, little boy?" she asked coolly.

mean it."

"I see I must take you in hand," she added.
"I've stood this thing long enough. I won't be knocked about myself or have the old man knocked about, either," said Charlie, deman kr fiantly.

"You won't?"

"No; I won't!"
The young man darted between the woman The young man darted between the woman and her victim, ard wrenched her grasp from his collar. He did it so quickly, and with so much energy, that he had not only released Job, but escaped her clutches himself. Seizing a small boat-hook, made of a broom handle, which hung in the room, he planted himself between Job and his unloving spouse. The lady looked wrathfully at him. Opposition in her own house, either by word or deed, was a new thing to her, and she was taken "all aback" by it.

"Kinder easy, Charlie," whined Job.
"Do you mean to strike me with that boathook?" demanded Mrs. Seagrain.
"Not if I can help it; but if you put your finger on him or me, I shall hit as hard as I know how," replied Charlie, shaking his head to emphasize the remark. "I can't stand this thing any longer. I am sick as death of it, and I will fight Job's battle for him as long as I can stand up."

"Kinder easy, Charlie," muttered the mis-

"Kinder easy, Charlie," muttered the miserable victim, terrined beyond measure at the boldness of the boy.

"Am I to submit to this little wretch's treatment of me?" demanded Mrs. Seagrain.

"Am I to be turned into the fields by his folly and sin?"

"I hope not, but it won't help the matter any to knock him about as you do," replied Charlie, with the dignity of a sage.

"I won't put up with it!" sau she spitefully, when she discovered that she had been intimidated, and had exhibited some signs of yielding. "I'll grind him to powder."

"No, you won't" added Charlie, demonstrating with the boat-hook.

Mrs. Seagrain was not so brave a woman as her fliopant tongue and her muscular effort seemed to indicate. She was the mistress of the house, rather because no one had opposed her than because she had the strongest will, and the stoutest arm. Job Seagrain was by no means an infant. On the sea, in the wild mutterings of the tempest, he was a bold, brave old fellow. His was a sinewy arm, and he could lift as big a basket of oysters as many a man of much greater weight. The woman did not like the looks of the young man. Inere was a fire in his eyes which warned her to be cautious. She did not offer to touch Job again. She seated herself by the stove, but she rocked and tipped herself about in the intensity of her excitement. She wanted to shake Charlie, and restore her authority, but the boat-hook was an ugly weapon, and she had a wholesome dread of it, for she knew that the young man was both stout and quick. If she could get hold of him, she could shake him all to vieces, as she did Job: but in the present instance, she must wait for a more convenient season to discipline the bold rebel.

"Things have come to a pretty pass in this house!" exclaimed Mrs. Seagrain, as she rocked violently in her chair. "I supnose I ain't nobody here now. Am I to be put down in this manner?"

"Easy, Charlie," whined Job. "Don't set on her again."
"The drunken little whelp of desolation," muttered the wife.
"Things are going to be different now." said the young man. "We won't have any more knocking about in the house."
"You wait and see," snapped Mrs. Seagrain. "We shan't have any house much longer," groaned Job.

more knocking about in the house."

"You wait and see," snapped Mrs. Seagrain.

"We shan't have any house much longer," groaned Job.

"Yes, we shall, governor. Don't worry about that. You and I can raise money enough to pay off this bill," added Charlie, confidently.

"I t...nk it is about time you did something," snarled the discomforted woman. "You have been laying about all summer, both of you, doin' nothin'."

"Come, governor, we will go off tonight, and see what we can make."

"Where are you going?" asked Job, timidly. "Going to make some money to pay this bill," replied Charlie. "We shall not be back till tomorrow night, if we are then."

"Are you going to stay away all night?" inquired Mrs. Seagrain.

"Yes, and perhaps tomorrow night."

"Where are you going?"

"To New 10rk."

"Don't you go, Job Seagrain," interposed his wife. "If you do, you shall suffer for it."

"But we must go to the city to sell our oysters," explained Charlie.

"You haven't got any oysters to sell."

"I know where to get them."

"I know where to get them."

"Where?" inquired Mrs. Seagrain.

"That's my secret, and I won't tell it to any living soul. Come, governor, we will pay off this bill in a few days."

"Don't you go, Job." protested the woman.

"Just now you grumbled at us for not doing anything; and now you won't let the governor do a job that will pay off his debts."

"I want to know what the job is first," replied Mrs. Seagrain.

"You won't know from me," answered Charlie, sullenly, as, with the boat-hook in his hand, he left the house.

Job immediately followed, for he dared not remain alone with his wife while she was in her present wrathful humor.

"Job! Job!" cried she, coming to the door.

"Don't mind her, governor. Come along with me," added Charlie, as he took a pair of oars from the shed.

"I dassent go," pleaded Job.

"Be a man, and come along."

"Do you know where there's any oysters?" asked the poor man.

"I do; I know where there's a bed of the

Be sure and not cover your head with the bed-clothes at night, thus depriving yourself of the warm air, and be careful about your covers, they should be warm but not heavy. A blanket is most desirable. Try and be as lazy as possible. You never saw a thin woman who was lazy. No, indeed. The whole family of thinners spend their time hunting for something to fill the flying hours. Let the hours fly if they want to, my dears, they are used to it, they have been doing it ever since the days of Mother Eve, but weary mortals weren't meant to fly, so just settle down into a quiet little walk and you'll find it gives the pounds of flesh a chance to catch up and settle down where they belong. Take a little nap in the middle of the day, even if only for fleten minutes. The napping habit can be cultivated. Sleep may not come at the first call or the second, but even resting with relaxed nerves and closed eyes, is something. This all sounds very lazy and indolent but that is what I want you to be for a few weeks. Give yourself time to grow beautiful. Let other things go for awhile. Give up your fack wonderfully. serious pursuits. After I see you firmly established in Beautyland, you can work as much as you please.

When your morning duties are over, slip into a comfortable hat and jacket, wear sensible shoes—sensible spells pretty also, you know—and take a good long walk in the fresh morning air. It will do you worlds of good. You need exercise and plenty of it to make the blood circulate and bring out a natural elimination of all waste and poisonous matter in your system. You can't be beautiful nor healthily plump, without good, pure blood flowing through your veins. To gain the much desired flesh, put on the curves of beauty and purify your blood, eat sensible food, such as fresh vegetables, baked potatoes, bacon, baked apples, etc., etc., and avoid fried foods as you would the plague. Cakes, pies, rich gravies, pancakes, fried meats and rich puddings are all bad and either make you unhealthy and flabbily fat or reverse the matter and cause you to become anemic and thin with sallow skin, dull eyes, and a discouraged outlook. In addition to eating sensible food, I wish all my girls would begin to drink—MILK!
Yes, I suppose you are surprised, but milk is a sovereign beauty remedy and has the additional wish all my girls would begin to drink—MILKI Yes, I suppose you are surprised, but milk is a sovereign beauty remedy and has the additional merit of being easy to take, easy to get and last but not least, it is extremely inexpensive. Now, please drink milk and lots of it this coming month, as in my opinion it is the "broad high road" to Beautyland. I have tested this diet and know what it will do, as I am a milk devotee and have practically lived on it for four years, and I know it brings health and beauty in a greater or lesser degree to anyone taking it. Try it and see what it does for you. I know you will all be delighted and "swear by milk" for the rest of your days. Milk makes good pure blood, rests the stomach which is having such a desperate struggle to hold its own, builds up your tissues and aching nerves, gives you firm healthy flesh, a dazzling complexion, bright, lustrous eyes, red lips, and plexion, bright, lustrous eyes, red lips, and there you are—a beautiful woman! Do you want to know how to take this diet? Well, take four quarts of milk every day, being careful to sup it very slowly, holding it in the mouth until thoroughly salivated. In this way the milk is digested before it reaches the stomach and prevents an attack of biliousness. So many people complain of this drawback in connection with a milk diet but when milk connection with a milk diet, but when milk forms into hard curds in the stomach, it is simply a sign that it has not been properly taken. Remember, milk is a food just as beefsteak is. You chew your beefsteak before swallowing it, do the same with your milk and swallowing it, do the same with your milk and you will have no trouble with so-called "biliousness." In addition to this milk diet you should take one small meal, composed chiefly of crisp vegetables and fresh fruits. At this season of the year fresh vegetables and fruits abound for every girl, whether in the noisy dusty cities and towns or the pleasant country pleas.

Massage has a distinct place in the thin girls' hygiene. It is a passive form of exercise and is very beneficial. If you spend a great deal of your time indoors, sitting quietly, you must take some means of stimulating your body. Massage in many cases offers this method and is frequently depended upon entirely. You should take this body massage upon arising in the morning. The body should be stripped to the morning. The body should be stripped to X. Y. Z.—Thank you for your photograph. Judging the waist. HERE are hundreds of clever ways which help to make one pretty, which ti'll tell you from time to time, but just this month I want to talk about the thin girls and show them how to get a pretty bust and arms.

My! how many there are of our thin members. It almost seems as if everybody is thin until you hear from the other side of the question. But you are all anxiously waiting, so I will proceed. My thin girls will find it much easier to grow plump and beautiful if they first firmly resolve not to worry, for worry, the greatest robber of woman's beauty, lies at the bottom of our thin little girl's woes. Forget to worry, laugh at the world, and you will find you are on the high road to beauty, not on some little straggling path, that might or might not, eventually lead to Beautyland, but the broad high road which leads you straightly with never a mis-step. The next thing for you to do is to sleep, and if you resemble me, you won't mind this health rule at all. See that your room is perfectly ventilated and make it a point to sleep at least to time and sadly in need of self massage. In order to stop this shivering, throw a Turkish towel (the largest one you have) across your shoulders and begin to rub yourself vigorously with it. As soon as you begin to get warm and your skin is in a glow, you can discontinue the use of the towel and begin a massage with your hands. Before beginning this hand massage, however, you should dip them in a jar of olive oil, so that your skin may be fed as well as stimulated by this treatment. Directions for Making Pretty Girls' Club Beauty Bags.

Take ordinary cheesecloth and cut it into strips two and a half inches wide by five inches long, fold over and sew up the sides making nice little bags about two and a half inches square, fill these with Quaker Oats and sew up the top of the bag and you have one of the most wonderful little healthful cleansers for the skin ever devised; they have such a healing effect upon skin disorders you will notice an immediate improvement if used as per following directions: Every night on going to bed fill a basin full of warm water and allow the bag to soak for a few seconds, not long, just till you see a little milky substance begin to ooze forth. Then using the bag as a wash cloth, thoroughly rub the face—every little crevice and wrinkle (later we'll get rid of crevices and wrinkles).
Keep moistening the bag just as you would a wash cloth.
The result will surprise you. It has a wonderful cleansing effect and removes all roughness and all scally bits of skin leaving the face smooth and soft and clean. (You don't realize how much the latter means, but half of us aren't clean, even when we think so). In the daytime, if for any reason your face feels rough and dry, use the "Beauty Bags" again. One of the most delightful presents
I know of for a pretty girl is a box of Beauty Bags, all daintily overcast or buttonholed with wash silk in delicate colors.

And Now for the Questions

And Now for the Questions.

Oh, my! what a lot of letters I received from the readers of the August article. Of course, a lot of my girls asked the same questions and on account of lack of space I could only select the most important ones to answer in Comfort. If you don't find your own special answer here just read the others, and I think you or nearly all, will find your questions answered somewhere among them—but the letters still pour in and I will do my best and reply to a lot more next month, when I will give you a talk on "The Care of the Hair."

Questions and Answers BY KATHERINE BOOTH.

Virginia.—I certainly sympathize with you in your trouble and am glad to say that superfluous hair can be permanently and safely removed, although it is somewhat difficult to do as the little hairs are most persistent. The best and quickest way, of course, if it is possible, is to have them removed by the electric needle, but if this is impossible, the following treatment brings sure results:

sults:
Apply Peroxide of Hydrogen to the affected part one day, and an application of aqua ammonia the next. The peroxide bleaches the hair to invisibility, and the ammonia kills the little hair roots. This treatment usually takes three or four months, but if persisted in the hairs will gradually die and fall out. It is a long task but sure, and takes only a moment each night before retiring. Try it.

ing. Try it.

Brown Eyes, Sad Heart and others interested in the safe and permanent removal of superfluous hair, please read my answer to Virginia in this column.

L. B.—Use one of my Beauty Bags instead of soap and you will be rewarded by a soft, white skin. You should also take my hot water remedy for several months. Wrinkles are annoying things, but if you keep right after them, they will gradually disappear. To banish them massage your face with light upward movements, first rubbing in a good skin food. I give you one formula here:

here:
Spermaceti, one half ounce, white wax, one half ounce, sweet almond oil, two ounces, lanoline, one ounce, cocoanut oil, one ounce, tincture of benzoin, three drops, orange flower water, one ounce. very careful to massage across the line of the wrinkle, along it. This is important.

NOTE. Besides being rather expensive we know it is diffi-cult for many of our readers to obtain all these ingredients and we have had a superior skin food made up for the special use of members of the Pretty Girls' Glub. The Publishers of COMFORT will send a nice jar of this Pretty Girls' Glub Skin Food, Wrinkle and Massage Gream free for a club of only two 15 cent subscribers to COMFORT as per offer at end of this Department.—EDITOR.

Magnolia Maid.—If your arms are only a little freekled, I would advise you to use the following preparation, which is a simple but strong remedy. The juice of three lemons, strained; four ounces of alcohol and two ounces of rosewater. Apply, and let dry into the skin, after which rub in a good skin food, formula for which is given in my reply to "L. B." in this column. White spots on the nails are nearly always due to injury, and you must be careful not to bruise them in any way.

Perplexed.—If you desire long curling eyelashes, moisten the edges of your cyclids with red vaseline every night before retiring. Be careful not to get any in the eye itself. My article on the "complexion" in the September number of COMFORT will tell you what to do for pimples and blackheads, and when to do it.

Read my article on "Complexion" in September Comport for the proper treatment of blackheads and pimples. Dissolve a quarter of a teaspoonful of powdered borax in two quarts of tepid water each night and wash your face thoroughly. This keeps the skin perfectly clean and helps banish the annoying blackheads. Use the Beauty Bags instead of soap for the face. Take a hot bath once a week, using soap on the body but not on the face, then every other day take a tepid sponge bath. Regarding eyelashes, moisten the edges of eyelids with red vaseline. You seem to have arranged your hair very prettily, and I would only suggest that you let it fall a little more loosely around the temples. Why not rub the raw cumber on the face? However, the preparation you mention is perfectly harmless.

Brown Eves Haveld Neb, and all others desirous of the strength of the proper tway to reduce flesh. You can keep your hair nice and fluffy by frequent shampoos, dissolving a little pow-dered borax in the last rinsing water, and by putting your hair up in kids every night.

L. P.—You should cut your hair at the ends, not singe the broken point. This is a rather tedious proceeding, which is the only thing to do. For dryness of the hair, massage once a day with olive oil, and just before shampooing treat it to a coal-oil bath. This will cause your hair and will keep it smooth and glossy.

cumber on the face? However, the preparation you mention is perfectly harmless.

Brown Eyes, Harold, Neb., and all others desirous of information about blackheads and facial disorders, are referred to my article on Complexion in last month's Comport. Massage your arms and hands every night with cocoa-butter or olive oil. As you grow older your arms and hands will plumpen naturally. You are not old enough yet, little girl, to be perfectly developed. Do your front hair up in a fluffy pompadour, braid your back hair, tie in a club on the nape of your neck, and pin on an enormons bow made of black taffeta ribbon about four inches wide. This is the latest fashion for a girl of your age. The fuice of one lemon mixed with one half ounce of honey is a good tan remover. Wear a sunbonnet or large hat when out in the sun.

Honor Bright and others.—If you will drink four or five quarts of milk every day, you will soon gain the desired pounds. You will also find it a wonderful bust developer. A woman can gain three or four inches through the bust on this treatment, and it will only take six or eight weeks. See will also average a gain of three or four pounds a week. Drink the milk slowly, so that it may become salivated before swallowing. Take only one meal a day. Massage the bust firm and white.

Black Eyes.—Massage your neck with olive oil each day and you will be pleased by the results. Heat the Black Eyes.—Massage your neck with olive oil each day and you will be pleased by the results. Use the following tonic for your hair, although if your hair is thick and curly you have little to complain of. Formula: Forty grains of Resorcin, one half ounce of water, one ounce each of alcohol and witch-hazel. Apply to scalp every night.

every night.

Peggy.—I think your skin must be too dry and would advise your rubbing in a good skin food and massaging your neck gently. After the massage dash cold water on your neck. Persist in this treatment and your neck will soon be soft, full and minus any blemish. Stop snarling your hair or very soon you won't have any to snarl, and that would be unfortunate. Wash your hair every week, putting a little borax in the rinsing water and you will find this will keep it sufficiently fluffy. Powder or cornstarch when allowed to lie on the scalp absorbs the natural oil of the hair, which gradually causes the hair to become dry and lifeless and finally to fall out. Instead of curling it with hot irons try putting it up in kids every night. See my reply to "Honor Bright" regarding bust development.

Sunflower-seed.—For liver spots take the juice of one development.

Sunflower-seed.—For liver spots take the juice of one lemon in a glass of water every day half an hour before breakfast. You should also eat plenty of stewed rhubarb. Get fresh eucumbers and massage your face with fresh cueumber juice every other day and you will soon note improvement. Too light clothes or indigestion would cause this redness of the nose. Cut out rich foods and take long walks. Rub in a little skin food, and massage, gently rubbing from the nostrills up the side of the nose and along the upper edge of the eyesocket. By doing this you follow the nerves which control the blood vessels and thus scatter the congested blood.

M. M. M.—You should not use soap upon your face, as thus scatter the congested blood.

M. M. M. —You should not use soap upon your face, as your skin is evidently too sensitive. Use my Beauty Bags for your face and this roughness and irritation will pass away. If you dash cold water on your face several times each day, your skin will soon be firm and your enlarged pores will gradually contract. Massage with a good skin food will also be of great benefit.

good skin food will also be of great benefit.

Lily Curey.—Following is a formula which will assist you in your difficulties: Tincture of cantharides, one ounce; liquid ammonia, one dram; glycerine, one half ounce; oil of thyme, one half ounce; rosemary oil, one half dram. Mix all together with six ounces of rosewater, rub into the scalp thoroughly until the dandruff has disappeared. A little vaseline rubbed briskly into the scalp each night will soon stop the falling of the hair and bring in a new growth. Be careful not to get it on the strands of hair.

B. L. S.—Read my article on "Complexion" in the September number of COMPORT, and follow instructions, and a clear rosy skin will soon be yours. A good tonic to increase growth of hair is given to "Black Eyes" in this column.

A. B. C.—Massage your scalp every night with vaseline until it is pink and glowing. Hair naturally comes out in the fall, but should not continue all winter. Read reply to "Black Eyes" for Resorcin tonic. For your height you should weigh about one hundred and thirty-five pounds. Try dieting for superfluous flesh. Cut out candy, rich puddings, pies, cakes, gravies, butter, sugar, in fact all the good things that your heart desires. Make it a habit to take lemon juice in a little water every morning before breakfast. Take long brisk walks every day—and long does not mean a ten or fifteen-minute walk. No, indeed; two or three hours of the day should be spent in walking. Don't sleep too much and keep busy every minute. Write again.

Lily Mever.—Your skin will soon be rosy and white if Lily Meyer.—Your skin will soon be rosy and white if you persevere with the hot water and Beauty Bags. For the olliness, dissolve a little powdered borax in the water when bathing your face. This will help you greatly. Shampoo your hair every ten or fourteen days, putting a teaspoonful of powdered borax in your last rinsing water. Dry your hair in the sun.

Dry your hair in the sun.

Catherine.—For those despised "brown spots" read my reply to "Sunflower-seed" in this column. You don't ever need to look old if you take care of yourself. Try drinking milk for the improvement of your general health; four or five quarts per day will clarify your skin, increase the quantity and quality of your blood, strengthen your stomach, fill out angles, and in fact work a transformation. Try Resorcin tonic for your hair, the formula given "Black Eyes" in this column, My Beauty Bags will make your skin soft and smooth and they are also very healing in case of facial eruptions.

S. J. L.—For fluffy hair read my reply to "Peggy." You also a fine white skin. It's worth trying, isn't it?

M. U.—Use the Beauty Bags until your skin is soft and smooth. Write and tell me if your face is thin or plump, and then I'll tell you how to arrange your hair. A pompadour is becoming to nearly everyone, and personally I like this way of dressing the hair. You must have something to heat water by, or else you would not be able to do any cooking. Moles are dangerous things to experiment with, and I should advise leaving it alone. You could probably have it removed by the electric needle, but even then it is dangerous.

A Blue-aved Lassie.—A good powder does not have the removed.

A Blue-eyed Lassie.—A good powder does not harm the skin, if your face is thoroughly washed each night before or a sir up in kids every night.

L. P.—You should cut your hair at the ends, not singe it. Each split or broken hair should be cut off just above the broken point. This is a rather tedious proceeding, but it is the only thing to do. For dryness of the hair, massage once a day with olive oil, and just before shampooing treat it to a coal-oil bath. This will cause your hair to grow.

L. L.—See reply to "L. P." Do not curl or snarl your hair, and shampoo frequently. Brushing is good for the hair and will keep it smooth and glossy.

A Speckled Erg.—Use a little borax in your rinsing water when shampooing. Do this and shampoo frequently. This will make your hair fluffy and easy to arrange. A full soft pompadour would be becoming. Let it lie loosely on your forehead. Moisten your finger nails with quinine to cure yourself of biting them.

Blue-eyed Mamma.—Touch edges of eyelids with red vascline. Never clip the eyelashes. See reply to "Speckled Egg." For oily skin dissolve a little borax in the water when bathing your face, then dash on cold water. My Beauty Bags are very beneficial.

Q. R. S.—Touch eyelids with red vascline or olive oil; the water when bathing your face, then dash on cold water. My Beauty Bags are very beneficial.

Q.R. S.—Touch eyelids with red vascline or olive oil; this will make the lashes grow. Scatter a few drops of Brilliantine on your hairbrush, then smooth your hair with it, after which put up in kid curlers and I think you will find the waves will stay in. If you are careful not to use too hot irons, your hair will not be injured much by curling irons.

G.E. B.—Try massaging your scalp with vascline every night until the scalp is pink and glowing. Keep your scalp loose upon your head. For good tonic to increase growth of hair use Resorcin tonic given "Black Eyes." Write me again.

C.A. J.—See reply to "A Speckled Egg" as regards findly hair. Brown moles can be removed by the electric needle, but this needs an expert operator. Moles are dangerous things with which to meddle. If ignorantly interfered with, it may be the starting point for some cancerous growth. Very little can be done for a scar, but a gentle massage with cold cream and then a little powder fluffed on will greatly improve their appearance. Old Father Time will also keep his gentle obliterating finger upon these little marks until they gradually fade away.

Rose Bud.—See reply to "Peggy." This will keep it flufy and you should also do your hair over roils or puffs, being careful to arrange it loosely. These pompadour pads and side and back-hair pads can be obtained at a dry goods store.

Yours in Need.—I wish I did have some magic curling fluid as I would be the first one to use it, but unfortu-ticulars read my reply to "Honor Bright." Thank you for your sweet letter.

Blue Bell, Haverhill, Iowa.—I agree with you. Always try to keep yourself looking sweet and pretty, married or unmarried. It's a duty you owe to yourself, your family, your husband, and the world at large. Following is a lotion which will whien the face and hands, but its best mission is that of making enlarged open pores less noticeable: Place in one half pint bottle one ounce of cucumber juice, half fill bottle with elderflower water, and add two tablespoonfuls of eau de cologne. Shake and add gradually one half ounce of simple tincture of benzoin, shaking the mixture now and then. Fill bottle with elderflower water. For your hair use Resorcin tonic given "Black Eyes" in this column. You could use a dye to make your hair darker, but I could not advise this. Frequent shampoos in rain-water and drying in the sun, followed by gentle brushing of the hair each day, will keep it soft and glossy.

Cousin May.—See reply to "Peggy" in this column regarding flufly hair. Why not wave your hair on the curiers every night, then draw it loosely over a pompadour pad. You could also use side and back pads under your hair. This is very fashionable at the present moment.

Ugly Girl.—Touch your eyebrows with castor-oil every dour pad. You could also use side and back pads under your hair. This is very fashionable at the present moment.

Ugly Girl.—Touch your eyebrows with castor-oil every night being careful to follow the eyebrow line, and apply red vaseline to the edges of your eyelids every night also, being careful not to get any in your eyes. To increase growth of hair use Resorcin tonic every other night, formula given to "Black Eyes" in this column. On alternate nights massage your scalp with vaseline until the scalp is pink. A little borax in your rinsing water when shampooing will keep your hair flufly. For your neck, massage every night with olive oil or cocca-butter. A long neck is considered to be very pretty. It only needs to be plumped a little and the olive oil will do this. Bending from the waist line will reduce the waist rapidly; the more you can bend the more your waist will go down. Sideward exercises are also fine for this purpose. For these exercises, stand erect, then bend forward to the floor and pick up a handkerchief you have placed there. Do not bend your knees—bend from the waist line.

W. L.—You can use Beauty Bags twice. You could dye your hair, but this I could not advise. No matter how good the dye the fact is always evident that the color is artificial; besides, all dyes injure the hair.

Golden Locks.—You are just the right weight for your height. For reducing waist read my reply to "Cousin May." Try Resorcin tonic for your hair, formula was given "Black Eyes" in this issue. Apply every other night and on alternate night massage your scalp with vaseline. To brighten the eye, steep good green tea, then at night soak bits of absorbent cotton in the liquid and

CHAPTER XXX.

HE HAD PLAYED HIS GAME.

LITTLE later Mrs. Robertson came LITTLE later Mrs. Robertson came in and matters were explained to her. She was a sweet woman, and Jerry's heart went out to her the instant he saw her. She was equally over again, while the tears of joy flowed silently down her cheeks.

"You must tell me all about yourself," said she, and Jerry told his story, to which both his father and his mother listened with keen attention.

she, and serry his mother listened with keen attention.

"I am glad that you have been brought up with such a fine family as the Parkhursts," said his father, and Mrs. Robertson said the same.

"I suppose I'll have to go back to them and explain matters," said Jerry. "I'll be rather sorry to leave them, too."

"Would you rather stay with them than come with us?" questioned his mother quickly.

"No, indeed," he said. "But what I was thinking of was, that they'll be sorry to have me leave them, Miss Mabel especially."

A long talk followed, and in the end Mr. Maxwell and Henry Davenbort were invited to dine with the Robertsons, including Jerry.

"What shall you do about Mrs. Starfield?" asked Mr. Maxwell, while they were gathered around the table. "She is almost at the end of her course and wants to go to England, to some of her relatives,"

"Let her go," answered Mr. Robertson, and so it was settled.

But all were anxious to hear the details of the old servant's tale, and in the end Mrs. Starfield was made to visit the Robertson house.

"The lawyer was to blame," she said, over and over again. "He said it would be an easy way to make big money, and poor Amos believed everything he said."

"What became of him?"

"What became of him?"

"His name was Jason Giroy, answered father.

"What became of him?"

"That is a question. I think he fled to England."

"He did, but he came back about eight years ago," answered Mrs. Starfield. "He changed his name and cut off his beard, so that folks wouldn't know him."

"Do you know what name he now uses?"

"Yes, sir—Richard Clarke."

"Richard Clarke!" ejaculated Jerry and Henry Davenport in a breath.

"Do you know the man?" demanded Mr. Robertson.

chant had done, and Mr. Robertson was equally grateful.

And now, leaving the others on their journey to the settlement near Hill's Tavern, we will go back to the Parkhurst family and see how matters were faring there.

Mr. Parkhurst, unaware of the favorable change that had taken place in his circumstances, was still nervous and irritable. Mabel, sustained by hope, bore all with unruffled serenity. As for Dick Clarke, he felt that matters were approaching a crisis. The gold that Indian John had stolen from him constituted the bulk of what he had on hand, so that by the end of a fortnight he would have barely enough left to carry him back to the city. But he did not suffer this to trouble him much, feeling assured that Mabel would finally yield. Knowing very well that this would not be from any preference for him personally, he thought it wisest to keep out of her way, and employed his time in hunting and fishing.

At length the fortnight expired.

With a heart elate with hope Clarke rode over to the residence of his prospective father-in-law. When he was admitted into the sitting-room, Mabel and her father were present. Dick Clarke advanced into the room with an air of easy indifference and affability, and bade Mabel and her father good morning.

"I'm a man of business, Mr. Parkhurst," he said, rubbing his hands, "and once again let me hope that you and your charming daughter have considered favorably the proposal I have made, and are prepared to accept it."

"In that case," said Mabel, "you are prepared of course to give up to my father the letter of which you came into possession?"

The lawyer looked slightly embarrassed.

"I haven't it with me just at this moment," he said.

"Doubtless you have it at the tavern, then. You must pardon us for being over-careful, but the circumstances seem to justify it."

The lawyer paused a moment in embarrassment.

"To tell the truth," he said, "I didn't bring the letter with me on this journey. I thought

The lawyer paused a moment in embarrassment.

"To tell the truth," he said, "I didn't bring the letter with me on this journey. I thought there would be considerable risk of losing it, and accordingly left it in New York, at my office." "How are we to know that you have such a letter, then?" asked Mr. Parkhurst.

"On my word of honor as a gentleman," commenced the lawyer.

"I am sorry you esteem your word so lightly," said Mabel coolly.

As she spoke she took from the table the letter that Clarke at once recognized as the one which he had lost.

"Confusion!" he muttered, while his heart sank within him.

"You undoubtedly recognize the letter," said Mabel.

"You undoubtedly recognized Mabel.
"Where did you get it?" demanded Dick Clarke briefly.
"Well, if you must know, our boy Jerry found it in the woods nearly three weeks ago."
"Humph! Of course he brought it to you at once?"

"Humpa. once?"

"He did."

"And have you—ahem—have you done anything in the matter?"

"I do not consider that that is any of your business, Mr Clarke, but since you want to know so much, I will answer that we have."

"You—er——"

"Mr Davenport and Jerry went to New York

"You—er—"
"Mr. Davenport and Jerry went to New York together over a fortnight since."
The lawyer fell back in amazement.
"And they—you have heard from them?" he faltered.

"And they—you have heard from them?" he faltered.
For reply the door to the next room opened and Henry Davenport and Jerry entered, for they had reached the place the night before.
"Yes, we are back, Mr. Clarke," said Henry Davenport. "And I am happy to say that the Parkhurst treasure is safe, and you will never be able to put your hand on a dollar of it."
It would be hard to realize Richard Clarke's feelings at that instant. He felt that he had played his game and lost utterly.
"I suppose there is no use of my staying here longer," he said, as steadily as he could, starting for the door.
"You can't go just yet!" cried Jerry and caught him by the arm.
"What do you want, boy? Let me go."

"I sha'n't do it. I've got a score to settle with you, and don't you forget it."

"A score to settle. What do you mean?"

"I mean to tell you that you are found out, Mr. Richard Clarke, or whatever your real name is. Father, will you come in?"

Again the door to the other room opened, and Mr. Maurice Robertson walked in and faced the lawyer.

At the unexpected appearance of the merchant the lawyer.

At the unexpected appearance of the merchant the lawyer's face grew deathly white, and he staggered as if about to fall.

"So you remember me, do you, Jason Gilroy?" demanded Jerry's father sternly.

"I—I—my name is not Gilroy," gasped the other, but he could scarcely frame the words.

"It is, and it is useless for you to deny it. You are Jason Gilroy, the man who plotted with the Starfields to rob me of my son, my baby boy Jerry, who stands beside me."

"Jerry—this boy is your son?"

"He is."

It was the last blow, and for a moment the lawyer was bereft of speech. Then he realized what this revelation meant to him—perhaps imprisonment for many years—and turned to leave the house. But again Jerry was too quick for him and sent him sprawling on the doorstep. Henry Davenport also rushed in, and soon the lawyer was a prisoner.

"And serves him good and right!" came from Mehitable, who had been listening to all that was said. "Just to think what a smooth talker he was!" And then she added to herself: "And to think I might have married him if he had popped the question! After this I won't marry nobody!" And she never did get married.

 A few words more, and we will draw our tale

A few words more, and we will draw our tale

A few words more, and we will draw our tale to a conclusion.

Much against his will, the rascally lawyer was made a close prisoner and taken to New York. Here Mrs. Starfield and Mr. Robertson testified against him, and he was sentenced to ten years in prison at hard labor.

When Joseph Parkhurst read the letter left by his father, and especially that portion which spoke of keeping the family honor intact, he was heartly ashamed of the manner in which he had treated Mabel, and he told his daughter so.

was heartily ashamed of the manner in which he had treated Mabel, and he told his daughter so. "Never mind, father," said the girl, "Remember our troubles are all over now."

A little later Mabel was married to Henry Davenport, and for her wedding portion the girl received one half of the treasure that had been found. The happy husband insisted on paying Jerry the five hundred dollars that had been promised, and to this Mr. Parkhurst added another five hundred out of his own purse. The wedding was a grand affair and all of our friends including Mehitable, were present.

Shortly after this wedding Mr. Parkhurst went back to New York to live. He repurchased his old home, and at his death left the property to Mabel and her husband, who used to spend part of their time in the country and the balance in the city. Mabel and Henry Davenport were very happy, and Mehitable lived with them until the day of her death.

It may interest some to learn what became of Inoian John. The money taken from the lawyer caused the red man to leave that locality entirely, and he moved up to Lake Erie. During the following winter he went out in the woods during a howling snowstorm and some weeks later was found at the foot of a big tree, frozen to death.

Jerry returned to New York with his newlyfound father, and after the general excitement

Jerry returned to New York with his newlyfound father, and after the general excitement was over the boy was sent to school, that he might receive a thorough education. When his school days were over Henry Maxwell took him in, and a few years later Jerry, through his father, was enabled to buy a half interest in the concern. He worked hard and was highly successful; and here we will leave him.

"Come in, Mr. Noel, and pick out your gauntlets."

"Not today. Juno indulged in tricks that Juniter keep one eye on her wiles."

"Not today. Juno indulged in tricks that made even Jupiter keep one eye on her wiles, and I shall merely admire at a safe distance."

In front of the glove counter half a dozen women clustered, and on the outside of the group three men lounged—one evidently a foreigner, with bushy beard, coarse, hairy hands, and furtive eyes, small even behind very large spectacles. Among several busy saleswomen it was easy to discover the center of attraction—a finely developed form, tall and graceful in every movement, and a face of surpassing beauty, lighted by dark violet eyes, flushed with the glow of perfect health, and crowned by a braided mass of glittering yellow hair heaped high on a shapely head, that held it as an empress wears her tiara. In its vivid coloring the face suggested a tropical flower, but, looking closer, one thought of a frozen tulip under a sheet of ice, so hard was the cold gleam of the defiant eyes and the proud compression of red lips that had forgotten how to smile, that seemed never to have known curves of tenderness. While Eglah waited, the foreigner leaned across the coun a half."

"In the next room. Men's department."
"You got the papers for the league?"
"Yes, that is all arranged. Meeting will be at ten o'clock tonight. You can't talk here."
He touched the rim of his hat and walked away, and she looked toward Eglah.
"Gray kid gloves, stitched with white silk."
"What size?"
"Eliye and a quarter"

"What size?"

"Five and a quarter."

The voi. had a sharp metallic ring, with an impatient inflection, and as she turned, lifting her arms to a box on an upper shelf, all the lovely outlines of her figure were shown most advantageously, and Eglah glanced over her shoulder at Mr. Herriott. He was watching the woman behind the counter with an intensely curious expression, as though disagreetensely curious expression, as though disagree-ably perplexed. She found the desired numtensely curious expression, as though disagrees ably perplexed. She found the desired number.

"Shall I stretch them?"

"No, it is not necessary."

"Do vou wish them fitted on your hands?"

"I will not give you that trouble. What is the price?"

"It is part of my business to fit them. Two dollars and a quarter. Here, cash!"

Eglah's desire to mention the chorister of St. Hyacinth's was quickly extinguished by the pronouncedly repellent bearing that plainly proclaimed all intercourse must be restricted to the business of the counter, and as she returned to the carriage, Mr. Herriott said:

"Well, you college girls are nothing if not severely classical, so I presume you will offer a ewe lamb, all garlanded with willow and dittany, and prinked out in pomegranate blossoms, on the Junonian altar."

"I am glad Jove tied her hands and hung her up above the earth and below the heavens, with anvils on her ankle: where she could do no more mischief. That goddess of yours has the most cruelly cold, hard face I ever looked at, and yet—in a way—so beautiful. Evidently she has not even the shadow of a soul—must have given it all to that angelic boy? What is her history? Of course she has one."

"It has been said hoppy women have none, and in this case adversity must have curdled very early the stream of her youthful joys. Vandiver investigated her—from a distance he says, as she froze him when he attempted acquaintanceship. He has a protege in the constabulary who learned through police channels all that she will allow to be known of her life. Some years ago she drifted here from the far West—part of the human flotsam annually stranded in this city, and she found work in a cloak manufactory. Later she incited a strike among the cloak cutters, which resulted disastrously for the workers, and when all the strikers submitted, she alone was refused reemployment, and doors were closed against her. She secured a position in a large brica-a-brac establishment, but when a valuable antique vase disappeared, she was suspected and arre Bohemian?"

"That depends upon your interpretation of a very flexible term. I am told she conducts herself with strict propriety, reports Mr. Dane dead, and receives attentions from no one; but she is avowedly a socialist of the extreme type; belongs to labor organizations, attends their meetings, makes impassioned addresses, and, in fine, is a female Ishmael whose hands are much too pretty for such savage work. Did you notice an odd-looking, shambling man with preposterous spectacles who spoke to her? He is an agent of a band of Russian Nihilists seeking aid from sympathizers here. She is reported as possessing some education, advocates 'single-tax' and all the communistic vagaries that appeal to the great mass of toilgo there today?"

"Certainly; silk-lined, fur-tipped gauntlets. I told you my errand was gloves; pray what other reason?"

"You are going to get a glimpse of 'Juno."

"Juno? Nearly everything comes to New York, sooner or later, but really I never imagined she could step out from the books of mythology. I hunt no goddess. When you pay your wager, be sure to select delicate fawn color, that will match my spring jacket."

"The debt is yours. Confess, Eglah—honor bright—you are curious about the woman who sells gloves in Fourteenth Street."

"I will present to you a witch's skirt, cap, and broomstick. But why 'Juno'?"

"The matter was thrashed out at the club last week, where Vandiver told us some artist had compared her to a print of the Ludovisi Juno hanging in Goupil's window. Hence her elevation to Olympus."

"Then you know all about her?"

"Then you know all about her?"

"On the contrary I never earn here in the club last the contrary I never earn here in the club class of the disgruntled assemble, and long-haired men and short-haired women—who absolutely believe that the only real 'devil is private propand short-haired women—who absolutely be-lieve that the only real 'devil is private prop-erty'—denounce wealth and preach their gospel of covetousness. Here we are at the ferry, and just in time to meet the boar." TO BE CONTINUED.

bind on the eye. Touch the edges of eyelids with red vaseline, this will cause the lashes to grow.

Rose Bush.—For falling hair and to increase growth use Resorcin tonic. See formula given to "Black Eyes" in another column. Bub a little white vaseline into your finger nails every night. This will make them less liable to crack. There is no way of reducing large knuckles, but a nightly massage with olive oil will fill out the loose skin and make your hands plump and white. Fluff a little powder over them in the morning.

S. M. P., Salida, O.—For care of the hair read my reply to "Cousin May" and "Black Eyes." Massage your hands nightly with olive oil or cocca-butter.

w. H., Muskegon.—For eczema of the scalp, you should consult some good scalp specialist. Remember that frequent shampoos, keeping the scalp clean and sweet will greatly lessen any irritation; also that the scalp is affected by the state of your general health. Eat sensible plain foods, drink plenty of water. Take a tepid sponge bath every day. A little salt in the water will stimulate the circulation and prove of benefit. See reply to "Honor Bright" about drinking milk. Anoint your eyebrows with castor-oil following your eyebrow line. Touch the eyelid edge with red vasciline. Draw your hair loosely over side hair pads, parting in middle, and coiling your back hair just above the nape of the neck. See reply to "Peggy" about fluffy hair, and go and do likewise. Good luck, my dear.

luck, my dear.

Ida, M. P.—For advice about hair read my reply to "Cousin May" and "Peggy." See my reply to "A B.C." regarding dieting for superfluous flesh. While undergoing the treatment take cold baths every morning, which will keep your skin firm and hard. For wrinkles massage with a good skin food for fifteen minutes each day. Read reply to "L. B." on this subject. I would leave the scar alone. Under the circumstances you mention it might be dangerous to interfere, and it would require an exceptionally expert operator. I do not think the work of removing scars by electricity is very successful.

Maggie Q.—A rubber complexion brush is a good thing to use. As regards the skin food you mention I have never used it, so cannot tell whether it is injurious or not.

R. H. L., Batavia, Ohio.—Take an ordinary sized glass or cup. Either hard or soft water would be all right. I should prefer hard water myself for drinking purposes.

Audra.—You should take your hot water without sweetening or flavoring. You probably take it tepid, which nauseates you. Drink it quite hot and I think you will have no trouble.

Frances L. L.-Take my hot water recipe for several months.

M. J. H.—Great pressure on the joint of the large toe frequently results in a bunion. The joint should be relieved of all pressure. Wear a loose slipper until inflammation has subsided. Use following lotion—carbolic acid, tincture of iodine and glycerine, two drams of each. Apply with camel's-hair brush every day. Lemon juice will remove brown spots from the skin.

Mayflower.—I'm sorry, but there is no remedy. But re-nember there are much worse things in this world of member there are much worse things in this with ours.

F. D.—I do not know the preparation you refer to. The juice of one lemon mixed with one half ounce of pure honey is good for bleaching the face.

M. H., Center, Ind. Ter.—Make skin food as follows: Melt white wax, lanoline, sweet almond oil and cocoabutter in a porcelain kettle. Take from the fire and add orange flower water. Beat with an egg-beater until cold. To make cold cream shave one fourth ounce white wax, two and one half ounces spermaceti and melt in porcelain kettle. Add two and one half ounces oil sweet almonds, and slightly heat but do not boil. Remove from stove and add one and one half ounce of rose water and one drop of attar of rose. I have changed your formula slightly.

Mrs. T. J. W.—A simple remedy for warts is as follows: Have your druggist put up a dram of salicylic acid and an ounce of collodion in a bottle which has a wire brush run through the cork. Apply mixture to warts twice a day and they will disappear.

Gusta.—If you want to become possessed of a good fig-day and they will disappear.

Gusta.—If you want to become possessed of a good figure and a "peaches and cream" complexion.—drink milk! You can gain from two to six pounds of flesh a week on a milk diet, and it is good firm healthy flesh, too. I have lived on milk for four years and I know whereof I speak. Take four or five quarts of milk each day, eat only one meal and have that composed of plain simple food. Drink your milk slowly, allowing it to become salivated before swallowing. You will find it a wonderful bust developer. Milk makes good pure blood and plenty of it, and rests your stomach and gives you abounding health. Take a glass every half hour during the day until two hours before supper, then stop. If it is impossible to drink the milk during the day take a breakfast and lunch of several quarts of milk. Yes, omit your glass of hot water at noon. If you take the milk diet discontinue your hot water for a while.

Mearie.—You say massage does not help you. Are you your hot water for a while.

Mearie.—You say massage does not help you. Are you sure you do it correctly? Massage upward with a little circular movement using a good skin food. Cultivate happy thoughts. Perhaps you have some trouble with your eyes. That often causes a drawn expression to the Sunflower, Brision, Ind. Ter.—For your height you are too thin. See my letter to Gusta and you will not need to pad. No. I do not disapprove of padding, when one is very thin. I do not disapprove of anything that improves your appearance, so long as it does not injure the health.

Eagerness and Lois L.—Massage your arms with olive oil every night.

Eagerness and Lois L.—Massage your arms with olive oil every night.

A Friend.—Regarding hot water see reply to "Audra." Touch eyelid edge with red vaseline. Massage will plumpen out your cheeks again. Use upward movement and remember that light massage plumpens the face and heavy massage reduces the flesh. Hot water ought to give you rosy lips in time. Peroxide of hydrogen will bleach yellow teeth and whiten them. It is also a good Antiseptic mouth wash. A good and simple formula for tooth powder is made up of equal parts of precipitated chalk and powdered orris root. Add any flavoring essence that you desire.

F. A. Dunbar.—Take the milk diet. See reply to "Gusta" in these pages. To whiten hands and arms use the following lotion: Two ounces bay rum, two ounces lemon juice, two ounces glycerine. Mix and apply while hands are wet after bathing and shake them dry.

Kate A., Chipley, Ga.—See replies to "Gusta" and "Black Eyes" regarding hair and form. Try tonic mentioned, ast is what you need. The wrinkles will disappear when you are plumper. A good freekle lotion that is very effective is as follows: One dram of borax, one half fluid ounce of diluted acetic acid, one half fluid ounce of rose water. Put on the face several times a day with a soft little sponge.

Anyious—You could dre your hair, but I do not advise.

of rose water. Put a soft little sponge.

a soft little sponge.

Anxious.—You could dye your hair, but I do not advise it. Red hair is beautiful and all the rage now. Massaging your face with a good skin food will cause it to plumpen and round out. For freckle lotion see reply to "Kate A." Nothing can be done to change the shape of your eyes.

Comfort Praiser.—See my article on Complexion in last month's Comport. If not indulged in too vigorously roller-skating is a good exercise. Most girls are troubled with slight eruptions of the skin every month.

Honey.—Massage your face with a good skin food, use upward movement and be sure and massage lightly. The muscles of the cheek are very apt to sag and thus causes the face to appear thin. Dash cold water over your face several times a day, as that keeps the flesh firm.

Miss L. B.—See replies to "Gusta" and "Honor Bright."
The milk diet is recommended by all first-class doctors for kidney trouble. Any female irregularities should be attended to at once, as nothing will wear you out more than that. I know you will be pleased if you take the milk diet. You might also massage the bust with olive oil or cocoa-butter, say fifteen minutes each day.

Susie.—The only way to darken your hair would be to dye it, and I could not advise that. Dissolve a little borax in the water when you bathe your face. This will help counteract the "oiliness" you speak of. You can also wipe your face off once or twice a day with diluted alcohol.

Delia S.—Have your mother massage her face every lay with a good skin food, massaging across the wrinkles. M. F. J.—For freekle lotion see reply to "Kate A."
Annoint your eyebrows with castor-oil every night, being careful to follow the eyebrow line.

Arrah Wanna.—See reply to "M. E. J." on eyebrows, but this will only increase the growth, not change the color. To secure long cyclashes touch the cyclid edge with red vaseline. Moles can be removed by the electric needle if they are common brown moles, but even then it is retter dangerous.

Lassie.—Wear the gold ring on one hand and the silver ing on the other. Yes, the lemon juice should be left on Alva W.—You can use each Beauty Bag twice. For eyelashes see reply to "M. E. J." Here is a prescription for a powder which will prevent excessive perspiration under the arms: Oleate of zinc, one dram; powdered starch, one ounce; salicylic acid, one third of a dram. Dust this over affected parts.

Lillian.—See letter to "Arrah Wanna." If you must darken your lashes, buy an eyebrow pencil (black).

Wanda.—Use Beauty Bags for your sensitive skin. Tr gentle massage with good skin food. Dash cold water is the face, as that hardens the skin and makes it less sen sitive.

Y. O. O.—For brown spots, apply juice of lemon each night. Drink lots of hot water and use my Beauty Bags.

night. Drink lots of hot water and use my Beauty Bags.

I. M. A.—Keep your hair clean and sweet and massage scalp with finger tips each night until scalp is pink and glowing. Read my reply to "Peggy." To keep the hands soft and white, massage with olive oil each night. This will also plumpen the hands. Keep the nails clean and the scarf skin pushed away so the half moon shows. To make your nails pink and bright rub in a skin food every night. This will keep your nails from cracking. Do not use the curling tongs on your hair. Later on, Comporer will publish an article from me on the Care of the Hair.

Miss Amanda.—Make up your mind you won't be round-shouldered. Keep reminding yourself to keep your shoulders straight and it will soon become a habit. No, stoop shoulders are not caused by catarrh. See my article on the care of the skin.

on the care of the skin.

C. A. S.—Dissolve a little powdered borax in water when bathing your face. This is very cleansing. Steam your face once a week over a teakettle filled with bolling water, throwing a towel over your face to keep in the steam. Then wash the face with water having a pinch of borax in it, rinse, dry and massage with good cream, then close the pores by dashing cold water on the face. See replies to "Kate A." on freekles and reply to "Blue Bell" when pages.

Pretty Molly.—Clean your naifs with a rosewood stick with a sharpened point. First though, soak your hands in a basin of hot water (soapy), and scrub hands and nails vigorously with a nail brush. For freekle remover see reply to "Kate A." You can fill out your neck by massaging it with olive oil each night.

Red Roses.—Try the milk diet, girlie, and you will have red cheeks and lips. Read my letter to "Gusta" in this column. You should use the hot water remedy for three or four months. A very pretty dimple can be made permanently without injuring the skin in any way by mixing some gum arabic in water. Use very little water so that the gum is thick and then apply a spot to the cheek or chin. When the gum begins to dry press it gently with the stub end of a lead pencil and hold in that position for five minutes, then remove the pencil and the indentation will remain. Powder lightly and the dimple will look very bewitching.

M. E. S.—See replies to "Lois L." and "Kate A." in

M. E. S.—See replies to "Lois L." and "Kate A." in this column. The following formula is good for tan remover and skin whitener: Oil of sweet almonds, two ounces; fresh cucumber juice, ten ounces; white Castile soap, one fourth ounce; essence of cucumbers, three ounces; tincture of bensoin, thirty-eight drops. See reply to "Gusta" on milk diet. This will give you a clear, healthy, glowing skin.

Pretty Pansy.—See reply to "Lois L." and rub white vaseline on your elbows every night, having previously scrubbed your elbows thoroughly with soap and water and a nail brush. Read letter to "Gusta," which will tell you how to secure a pretty rounded figure and a wild-rose complexion.

Bernice.—See reply to "Black Eyes" regarding hair. A red shining nose is certainly not an adornment. See reply to "Peggy" and apply this ointment: One dram of powdered sulphur; two and one half drams of powdered starch; one and one half ounces of ointment of zinc oxide; three drops of oil of rose.

E. D. L.—For good face cream formula, see reply to "M. H." Read directions for reducing waist line and abdomen given "Ugly Girl." Come again, girls.

E. H. F.—Massage your face with good skin food and dash cold water on it several times a day. Apply alcohol after bathing your face, as alcohol tends to toughen the skin and enables it to resist the attacks of sun, cold and wind.

Little Sweetheart.—Use my Beauty Bags on your face Little Sweetheart.—Use my Beauty Bags on your face instead of soap. For yellow, discolored neck use the following simple remedy: One ounce honey; one teaspoonful lemon juice; six drops of oil of bitter almonds, the whites of two eggs and enough fine cornmeal to make a smooth paste. Apply at night, covering with a piece of soft linen. Three or four applications will bleach the skin beautifully white. Write me every month and ask as many questions as you want, my dear.

ollie B.—My Beauty Bags will cause your face to be less "greasy," but you should also dissolve a little borax in tepid water and bathe your nose twice a day. Wiping it with diluted alcohol once a day will also help. Keep your nose well powdered.

nose well powdered.

J. E. H.—Your flushed face may be caused by too rich foods or tight clothes. Be careful to avoid pies, gravies, sauces, rich puddings, etc. Take the juice of one lemon in a cup of cool water one hour before breakfast. Try my hot water recipe, and plenty of outdoor exercise.

L. M. S., Mo.—Hot water is very good for cases of stomach trouble. See replies to "Arrah Wanna" and "Lilliam" on eyelashes, Use Resorcin tonic for your hair. Formula was given "Black Eyes" in another column. A heaping teaspoonful of powdered borax dissolved in your rinsing water when washing your hair will lighten it slightly. Drying in the sun will also keep it bright and light.

S. A.—See reply to "Little Sweetheart" regarding yellow neck. I would not advise alcohol.

IOW NECK. I WOULD NOT ADVISE ALCOHOL.

D. R. H.—Try rassage with good skin food; also use the bleach given "Little Sweetheart," for your face. If you persist with the hot water you will find this uncomfortable feeling will pass away. Eat plenty of fresh vegetables and take long walks. Use my Beauty Bags regularly

U F.—Use lotion given "M. E. S." The Beauty Bags are very whitening also both for arms and face. Dash cold water on your face frequently and when bathing your face, dissolve a little powdered borax in the water. Of course you can have whiter hands. Massage hands with olive oil and cocoa butter every night and you will soon note improvement.

The Lone Daisy.—I think the soap you mention is less harmful than many others, but should advise your using Beauty Bags for your face instead. For sunburn remover see reply to "Brown Eyes," Harold, Neb. Take hot water recipe. That will give you rosy cheeks.

P. S.—Massage your face with skin food, then dash cold water on your face, and powder before going out in cold weather.

weather.

Topsy.—Use Beauty Eags instead of soap. Your blood is certainly all wrong and I should advise your taking the milk diet. See directions given "Gusta," Hot water is also good for purifying the system. Massage your face gently every night with skin food, this will lessen the irritation. A little powdered borax in your water when bathing the face will keep your pores clean, which is important.

Loly Table —See your to 197-157.

Jolly Telle,—See reply to "Susie" and use bleach given "Little Sweetheart." Spread this preparation on the face and let it remain all night.

Florence M.—If you persist in taking hot water, the uncomfortable feeling will soon pass away. Hot water is more cleansing than cold. Do not use sweetening.

T. H., Georgetown, Texas.—You should go to some good doctor and find out what causes your headaches. Headaches usually are caused by nerves, astigmatism of the eye, stomach and liver trouble, etc. Your general health also probably needs toning up. See reply to "Gusta." Use Resorcin tonic (formula given to "Black Eyes" in another column). Every night to increase hair growth, massage the scalp with common vaseline until the scalp is pink and glowing. Results, I know, will be satisfactory.

D. O. N. T.—See reply to "Ugly Girl;" this exercise will reduce hips, waist and abdomen.

Cora D.—See letter to "A. B. C." If you are busy all the time, you don't need to take the walk advised. Hot baths reduce flesh rapidly.

Gray-haired Widow.—You should cut down on rich foods. Eat very sparingly. Hot water is very good for cases of stomach trouble. Try exercise given "Ugly Girl." This should be practiced fifteen minutes each day. Massage your face with skin food. This will fill out the hollows.

Wilhelmina.—A good lotion for moth patches consists of one half dram of salicylic acid to two ounces of bay rum. Mop on spots night and morning. You could also use colorless iodine. Be very careful about making these applications. Picture was not inclosed.

Violet.—The puffiness was caused by heat succeeding cold, I do not think this has anything to do with your brown spots appearing. See reply to "Sunflower-seed" and "Catherine."

Brown Eyes, Wakon, Iowa.—It could be removed by lectricity. I cannot advise you unless you explain more ally. Is it a liver spot, or a patch, or a mole?

M. D. W.—See letter to "Wilhelmina." No, my Beauty Bags will not remove patches. Hot water will get the stomach in good condition, cleanse the skin, and purify the blood.

Iowa Beauty.—See letter to "C. A. J." Soak your feet in hot water before going to bed, this induces sleep. Never go to bed hungry. A glass of milk and a cracker gives the stomach something to do, the object being to draw the blood away from the brain.

draw the blood away from the brain.

Gray-eyed Rattie.—You need the milk diet and I hope you will begin right away. See letter to "Gusta." If you can't do this keep up the hot water, read my article on complexion, use my Beauty Bags and apply bleach (formula given "Little Sweetheart" in this column) to the face. Massage your face with skin food. Write and tell me if the spots are moles, patches, or liver spots? Stop using the remedy you mention. Have you freckles?

H. D.—You may have some female trouble. Consult a doctor about morning nervousness and pain in the head. I think my hot water recipe would help you, as your stomach is certainly out of order. Write more fully.

A. G., Seymour, Iowa —See reply to "Ugly Girl." You will be longer waisted, when your waist becomes slighter. You should also slope the front gores of your skirt down about three fourths of an inch—this gives a long-waisted appearance. Read directions for increasing weight given "Gusta." Irecommended a good bleach to "Little Sweetheart." Apply to face and let stay on all night. Whiten hands by applying lemon juice. Recipe for cold cream was given to "M. H." in another column. Massage your face with this cream or some other good cream every day. Good moth patch lotion was given "Wilhelmina."

Success to you.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Publishers of COMFORT knowing it will be difficult for its readers to handily obtain all of the ingredients given "M. H." in these columns for making this cold cream, a superior cold Gream has been prepared for them by expert ehemists that will give the beat satisfaction to the members of the Pretty Girls' Glub, to use as a face cream. This is excellent for all purposes that any Cold or Face Gream can be used for, and the Publishers of COMFORT will send any reader of this column a nice jar of this Gream free for getting a club of only two yearly subscribers to COMFORT at 15 cents each.

ALSO A SKIN FOOD.

Many also desire a proper Skin Food and Massage Cream to remove wrinkles, develop the bust and neck, etc. We have also had this prepared and will send one jar free for a club of two subscribers to COMFORT at 15 cents each, or for a club of five yearly subscribers at 15 cents each we will send one jar of each, Cold or Face Cream and a jar of Skin Food for Massage, together with a special book on Massage, Bust Development, etc.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have taken this paper for some years, and find great comfort in reading it. For the last five years, I have been trying to find a certain book, but I do not know the author's name nor the exact title, but it is something like "Aspenwill," or "Aspenwold." It is the autobiography of a young man and the first chapter is descriptive of a southern home.

Black "Mammy" stands on tiptoe looking dewn the road with hand apove her eyes, to see if she can see her master. She says, "No, I don't see nuffin of him," and turning enters the house. I read the book when a young girl and thought perhaps some of the elderly sisters might know of a copy. I should be delighted to secure one. Address all letters to MRS. M. A. YORKE, 468 N. Kenilworth Ave., Oak Park, Cook Co., Illinois.

Oak Park, Cook Co., Illinois.

Dear Mrs. Wilkinson and Sisters:

I notice many of the readers admit that Comport is one of the most interesting and helpful papers published, and I heartily agree with them. Having been a silent reader for some time and not seeing a word from our little city, I thought I would join in the merry throng and D. M. Ryder in helping others. If this world be numbered with the rest. I agree with Mrs. had more sunbeams and less crabapples all would be happier.

The Bible says "Love your enemies." How many of us are doing that?

I have been married two years and God has blessed me with a good husband and dear little baby girl now three months old.

I am a great lover of flowers and do some fancy work. I have just finished a shirt-waist in shadow embroidery and will gladly send the design to anyone desiring it.

Mrs. Eckle. I would like to have the baby pillow and will return favor in any way I can. May God guide and protect you one and all is the prayer of Mrs. E. L. Bozel, 420 Halifax Street, Peters-

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Will you allow me space to thank the COMFORT sisters for the wen remedy? I received so many letters I could not possibly reply to them all, unless I had been a rich man's wife. The wen has been removed, thanks to one of the remedies received through COMFORT. It was of four years' growth and it required time, patience, and a great deal of physical pain, as I used the salt and yolk of egg remedy prescribed by many.

Mrs. Leland Harris and others who promised to write failed to do so. What was the reason? Will all who wrote me accept this as a personal letter? I could not use all the many different remedies sent me, though I believe they were all equally good.

Mrs. JNO. H. NICHOLSON, Wakulla, Fla.

Requests from Shutsins

Requests from Shutins

We reluctantly make a change in this department this month because we are practically forced to do so on account of the flood of requests and letters which pour in from sufferers all over this country.

Although we have always condensed and made each appeal as concise as possible, a number unavoidably have been crowded out of this corner from month to month, thus causing dissatisfaction and a trial of patience for all concerned.

Until all the requests received to date, have appeared, we will simply give the name and address of each invalid, and ask each one personally to remember them in any way possible. Letters, books, little souvenir and remembrances,

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

HE middle of the Autumn-time is October, dear Cousins, and October is a lovely month when we all ought to feel good towards the world. I hope it has that effect on you, and that the melancholy days, the poet speaks of, have not been that way to you, and that they never will be. I love the October days, and if you like the things I do, so will you. Whether one of these is work, or not, I won't say. Only there is work to do and we mustn't talk during business hours. HE middle of the Autumn-time is Oc-

The first cousin in the list this month is Blue Bell of Somerville, Conn., who has had a "break up" with her sweetheart and wants him to come back again. My, my, how many of you are like that? And just a little common sense and forbearance would have prevented it. Well, cousin, when you meet him again be real pleasant to him and ask him if he doesn't think both of you have been very foolish without any cause. If he is ugly after that, he is too ugly to worry over. cause. If he worry over.

cause. If he is ugly after that, he is too ugly to worry over.

Anxious, Brewer, Mo.—He's honest enough, to tell you that he likes another girl better, but if he can't get her, he will take you. If you want to wait for him, all right. But most girls wouldn't. (2) He is neglectful and you can treat him as you please. But find out first why he didn't answer your letter. (3) It is proper to ask your escort to call on you, even though he has taken you home only the one time.

Brown Eyes, Downer's Grove, Ill.—You acted so thoughtlessly as to be silly, and you certainly owe him an apology.

Brown Curls, Hazel, S. D.—Yes, you can tell the young man when you have first met him that you hope to meet him again, if both of you have had a pleasant meeting.

Troubled Maiden. Central City, Ia.—Certainly a girl of nineteen should not have the privilege of accepting the attentions of a man without her mother's permission. Obey your mother, at least, until you are of age. Then if you want to take risks, you are responsible to yourself. As for marrying, that is also your own business if you wait until you are of age. (2) Candy, books, flowers, etc., may be accepted from men, but nothing of value.

Juanita, Wortham, Texas.—Those are only the advance touches he is making to see if you will of value.

Juanita, Wortham, Texas.—Those are only the advance touches he is making to see if you will let him put his arm around you. If you like him, you need not give him up on that account, but quietly tell him you do not like it, and he must not do it, or you will have to send him away. If he really likes you he will think more of you for telling him. (2) He will have to give up the other girl, won't he?

up the other girl, won't he?

Puzzled Girl, Danville, Ga.—Unless the young man has good reasons for waiting, you should break the engagement. Two years is too long to be engaged, unless there is excellent cause for the delay. (2) Can't you find out why he has not answered your letter? Write and ask him. (3) Don't worry about what he is coming for. He'll let you know.

Mamma's Fairy, Lake Arthur, N. M.—At fourteen you had better let your mother write to the young man explaining why you can't write to him. (2) You did quite right in leaving the room where the teacher was who tried to kiss you. You should have reported him to the trustees. That kind of man is not fit to teach girls. (3) Don't let your cousin be quite as familiar as your brother may be. Cousins are not brothers.

Baby, Mason, Texas.—If the young man refuses to return your presents, and you have no other man to call on, then you might ask the sheriff. He'll get them all right, and scare the young man besides.

Lonely, Enterprise, Fla.—So long as you have no beau, and do not care for the beaus of the other girls, I think you have a right to "jolly" with all of them, but you must do it so nicely as not to gain the ill will of the other girls. Never walk with a couple unless the invitation to do so comes from the girl. Otherwise there'll be trouble.

Troubled Heart, Solona, Ill.—For goodness sake don't find fault with him because he wants you to have a good time when he is away. Do you want him to tie you up to a post and keep you at home unless he can be around to watch you? Really, Cousin, you are silly.

Lassle, Rosebud and Water Lily, Gallion, Ala.—A girl cannot honestly have more than one sweetheart. (2) The young man, who tells two girls he loves them, does not love either, and is trying to deceive both. (3) First cousins may marry in Alabama, by law. but they should not do so.

not do so.

Big Daisy, Santa Claus, Ind.—I suppose you are too particular for the boys and do not let them handle you as if you were a bale of rags. But you are right and can well afford to maintain your self-respect at the price of such attention. (2) As to the boy you like, if you will continue to be on friendly terms with him as you are now, it will work around right, if it is to be. Don't scare him by being too anxious.

voi are now, it will work atomic right, it is to be. Don't scare him by being too anxious.

Vivian, Mt., Vernon, O.—Most women who have married respectable stingy men think it is really more trying than to have married liberal ones who were not so very respectable. If this one who wants to marry you had the liberal spirit he would help you to regain your health first. Did you ever ask him to do so? Try it and see what he says. In any event if your health is poor you should not marry.

Anxious Heart, Eldorado Springs, Mo.—The young man is so anxious to get rid of you that he almost slaps you in the face. The way he treated you about taking you to the picnic was inexcusable. Write and tell him so, and that you are done with him for all time. Ask him to return your photograph, and send his to him when you write. He's no sort of good.

Simple Sally, Mceker, Okla.—What does a Simple Sally, Meeker, Okla.—What does a oy of seventeen know about love? And a girl f sixteen hasn't much more judgment. Scrapt out between yourselves, and when you are old nough to know better you will wonder why you zere so silly.

were so silly.

Unhappy Kathie, Forest Place, Md.—Break the engagement by all means rather than marry a man whom you cannot love and honor. It is much more dishonorable to marry the man, feeling as you do, than to break the engagement. Indeed, the only honorable thing you can do is to break the engagement. The right kind of a man would much prefer that you did not marry him, I should think.

Three Dekret Kids Harang N D—If three him, I should think.

Three Dakota Kids, Havana, N. D.—If three of you don't know how to inspire the men to take you driving, I'm sure I don't. Shoo, kids, you must be old maids, like I am. No man takes me driving. (2) Love will find the way.

Lonesome Blue, Thomastown, Ala.—Wait till you are twenty-one, then if the young man is still of the same opinion he is now, you can with them.

Sweet Sixteen, Marietta, Ga.—Mind your mother. If you can't be sensible be as sensible as you can. Study hard and grow older. Keep your eyes on the older man, but don't place your heart anywhere till you are of age.

Brown-eyed Belle, Hico, Texas.—He is altogether too indifferent and likes other girls too much to be very reliable, I think. If he loved you as he should, he would not be kissing every girl he could. But, if you want to marry that kind, you may, if you think you'll be happier with him than a better kind.

Little Buttercup, Barcom, Fla.—You proved how much he loved you by refusing to let him kiss you, merely because he told you he loved you. After you refused him he went away and never mentioned the subject again. Do you imagine he could have treated you so, if he really loved you? He was only fooling you, that was all.

There, dears, your questions are answered, and I have had very little scolding to do, haven't I? I must be getting in a better humor. Some of the cousins will find their questions answered in the Etiquette column because they accressed their letters to the Etiquette Editor, and some of them to me were on subjects of Etiquette and not intended for me. Now, by, by, and let us all try to be good for another whole month.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT readers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Augusta, Maine.

Mermaiden, Queen City, Mo.—Probably massaging the flesh would be the best remedy to get the skin back where it belongs. At least, it will be no harm to try it night and morning for a few weeks. Rub and knead yourself thoroughly for ten minutes each time.

thoroughly for ten minutes each time.

Troubled Heart, Heriot, S. C.—It is proper for a girl to correspond with a man fifteen years her senior, if her parents do not object. So it is for her to kiss the young man who has been going to see her four years. (2) Marry the man you love if he is the right kind of a man for you to marry. Find out as much about him as you can. Better ask questions now than when it is too late.

Brown-eved Ruth, Charlevoix, Mich.—It is

Brown-eyed Ruth, Charlevoix, Mich.—It is highly improper, and the chap should not be allowed in the house. (2) The lady to the man's left is the rule in walking, but there are exceptions. (3) Tell him you will be very glad to have him take you home.

Sunny Louise, New Smyrna, Fla.—The rub-her rain coat would be very appropriate for cool weather if it is one of these that does not look rubbery. For wearing to school it is better than any other kind, for no one knows when it may rain.

W. E. R., Wales, Wis.—The man should tip his hat when introduced to or meeting a lady, when he has his hat on. He should say he was glad to meet her or something like that, though he need not say anything except to respond to what she may say. (2) Oct. 1, 1890, Tuesday. (3) A man may part his hair on either side, or in the middle—until he becomes bald, when the middle is his only chance, and a wide one.

middle—until ne becomes bald, when the middle is his only chance, and a wide one.

Freckled Lass, Manchester, Mich.—If the custom of the community says it is right for the man to put his arm around the girl he is driving with, it may be followed with safety, we think. When it comes right down to a question of propriety, it is not proper. (2) The lady determines what is the correct hour to return from the drive. (3) An engaged young man has no right to go to places with other girls except with the consent of his fiancee.

Alabama Girl, New Brockton, Ala.—As long as you are not marrying his kinfolks, and he is all right, and they are respectable, what difference does it make? Of course if his folks are not people that you can associate with and they will be a handicap always, it makes a lot of difference, and you had better marry somebody else. But don't give him up unless there is something very serious the matter with his family, or him.

Alone, Murray, Ia.—At a formal dinner, the family, or him.

Alone, Murray, Ia.—At a formal dinner, the napkin need not be folded when you are through with it, but at a family dinner, where the others fold their napkins you may do the same, though you need not be extremely careful to get it perfectly folded. (2) Usually a sitting person rises to an introduction, though women may use their pleasure about it. Men, however, must if they are to be introduced to ladies, and usually to men, unless it is very imformal.

Applying Mate Buffelo N V—There is no

Anxious Kate, Buffalo, N. Y.—There is no remedy for a retreating chin. Nature made it that way, and that way it must remain.

that way, and that way it must remain.

Anxious, Midville, Iowa.—The mother should not sit all the evening helping her daughter entertain a young man caller. She should, however, come in and see him for a few minutes.

(2) The young man's sister should ask her brother to accompany her and her visitor, though the visitor might, if they were all quite informal with each other.

Fern, Merom, Ind.—A fourteen year old girl, we fancy, could eat ice cream with a boy at an ice cream supper, if her parents had no objection. Etiquette is not against it. (2) But she isn't quite old enough to wear her hair as women do.

C. C., Plattsburg, Mo.—Tell the girl of four-teen when she gets older she will have more sense, and that you are hoping to improve a little yourself. If you think you must marry at twenty-one, marry a woman seven years older than you are instead of a child seven years younger.

D. E. H., Sellersville, Pa.—Don't do it unless you want to queer the whole shooting-match. No charge for advice.

Black-eyed Susan, Nelsonville, O.—Something pretty and useful makes the best Christmas present for either sex, and preferably something for personal use, like a silver match safe for a man, or a silver pencil or bookmark for a girl.

(2) See answer above to "Freckled Lass."

Daisy, Rank, Tenn.—The lady thanks her escort for bringing her home from anywhere. She may thank him in her own way. There is no rule. (2) It is hospitable to ask him to call, even if he does not ask to call.

Bessie, Claremont, Minn.—Do you think it would be proper to send your photograph to a man whom you have ordered out of your house? What are you thinking about? (2) It is proper to call a man up by 'phone if you want to speak to him.

to him.

Heavy Heart, Lemars, Ia.—Why do you dream dreams and dawdle dawdles like that about the girl who is a fairy vision and so forth and so forth? Get on a train and go to Chicago after her. You need more action and less sentiment; less heart and more hustle. Get a move on and cinch your claim on "her who to me was more than a person." We have seldom heard from a young man who had a worse case than yours —and nobody to blame for it but himself. P. S. We don't know what kind of college you have at Lemars, but your letter would indicate that its curriculum was a shade shy on syntax, orthography and composition.

Reader. Tonic. Neb.—No wonder you are you thography and composition.

Reader, Tonic, Neb.—No wonder you are unpopular with boys and girls—you are a mollycoddle on your own admission. Brace up and hit the first boy that imposes on you. Hit him hard, even if you get licked. Keep at it till you lick somebody. In the mean time learn to dance and give the girls the whirl every time the band plays. You are seventeen now, and in a year or so you ought to be Nervy Ned of Tonicville.

W. Y. Waco. Tevas—At an arminal and the same arminal transfer.

W. Y., Waco, Texas.—At an evening wedding the groom wears the usual evening dress for men—with white tie, waistcoat and gloves. Day wedding he wears frock coat, dark gray trousers, pearl gloves and tie to match, and waistcoat of same color, or white. As soon after the ceremony as guests come to shake hands, he can take off his gloves.

Country Girl, Wall Lake, Ia.—You may thank the person who on saying good by adds that he is glad to have met you. And you may say that you are very glad to have met him, or her.

that you are very glad to have met him, or her. Troubled Girl, Glendale, Ore.—Tell the man you don't want his good opinion. Tell him also that it was your duty to tell his sweetheart about his making love to you and trying to put his arm around you. If more women and girls did as you have done with this man there would be decenter men around and the entire social atmosphere would clear up after the storm. As long as men know they can expect immunity from women so long will they transgress. You are all right.

L. M., Clarion, N. Y.—If his wife does not object he and his old sweetheart may exchange postcards.

Timmie, Akron, Ia.—You may wear any sort of a ring you please on the third finger of your left hand.

Indian Girl, Sapulpa, I. T.—Always thank anyone who extends to you any sort of courtesy. People should do that instinctively and not by W. F. E. M., Durango, Ia.—You are right, love does mean marriage, but many young men tell girls they love them, when the marriage idea is about the last to enter their minds. Don't be fooled by such talk. If a man really loves you and tells you so, he will ask you to marry him.

Subscriber, Centerville, Ia.—Wait until he shows that he wants to go with you. Be nice to him, but don't be too anxious. (2) Ask the young man what he meant by holding your hand so long.

F. F., Black Betsy, W. Va.—You can't change your hair from brown to black except by the use of dyes which are much worse than brown hair.

Troubled Girl, Moundsville, Wis.—Summer shirt-waists don't look well worn in winter, no matter what you have under them to make them warm. However, if others in Moundsville wear them, you may. (2) It is all right to kiss your flance before strangers. Let them talk. What do you care?

Perplexed Matron, Tilden, Idaho.—Wear your skirts to your shoetops. Black is too somber for a girl of fifteen. Wear something young and bright.

E. H., Rutledge, Tenn.—Teaspoonful of phosphate soda in glass of water to clear the complexion. Let it dissolve in the water and drink it. It is not for external application.

it. It is not for external application.

Black Eyes, Farina, Ill.—Obey your father, no matter if the young man does act like a gentleman when in your presence.

Laura, Rochester, N. Y.—Wedding announcements do not call for presents. Neither do invitations unless you want to give them. (2) In signing your name to a letter or other paper which is to come before any person or persons to whom you are unknown always prefix it with (Miss). When you marry, if you sign your married name not having your husband's initials prefix (Mrs).

"Why didn't you tell me on't?"

"I'm not going to pour them into your rum bottle."

"I won't drink no more, Charlie."

"I have heard you say that before."

"Sartin true this time."

"Will you go with me or not?" demanded the boy, impatiently.

"She'll kill me, if I do."

"I won't come back again, if you don't go," added Charlie.

"I wish I dared to go," said Job, as he glanced at the door where his persecutor stood.

"Come on board the boat, if you don't go any farther."

Job followed him down to the creek.

"Come on board the boat, if you don't go any farther."

Job followed him down to the creek.
"Job!" screamed his wife.
"I'm only going to the boat. I'll come right back," answered the wretched husband.

The creek was but a short distance from the house. They embarked in the tender, and Charlie pulled down the stream to a point near the mouth of it, where Job's boat, which he loved better than his wife, was moored. Like her, its na was Betsy Ann, for the owner had christened it before his family relations had become so unpleasant. It was a schooner of some twenty tons, and though she had seen many years of hard service, she still looked very well, and was noted as a stiff and weatherly craft. She had a considerable cabin, where her owner was always happier than in his own house.

Charlie hoisted the mainsail, and then run up the jib in spite of Job's protest. Dropping the moorings, he took the helm, and the Betsy Ann stood off from the shore.

Here's a Happy Family.

In every home there comes a time when all means of entertainment have fled. Every way to bring joy and cheerfulness has been exhausted. At those times father and mother begin to wonder what can times father and mother begin to wonder what can be done to keep the boys and girls at home. It is a serious problem, but it must be met in every household. Young folks need something more than the things which have kept the older ones entertained. There is no father nor mother who does not want to keep the children at home, entertain them at home, take away the dullness and make them feel at home. I don't believe you could find better entertainment for the home and for your children than that which is pictured here. Surely there is no lack of joy with such scenes occurring nightly.

This man has provided an Edison Phonograph with Edison Gold Moulded records for his family. Tonight they are enjoying a minstrel show. If father, mother, baby and sons did not know that the music came from an Edison Phonograph they would be willing to SWEAR that the singers were in the same room with them.

Tomorrow night they will have a band concert interspersed with beautiful operatic songs. The next night they will hear the beautiful chimes of Trinity just as they have been heard by thousands of tourists awed by their sublime beauty. They will hear also the wonderful violin solo with harp accompaniment and a Wagnerian piano recital. Where is there a chance for any misery to creep into this home?

is there a chance for any misery to creep into this home?

Music has a strange and fascinating power. It moves the human race to great and dignified actions. Why is it that in the heat of battle the regimental bands atrike up the liveliest and the fiercest airs? It is to fire the soldiers with an enthusiasm that even the bravest could not feel if it were not for the stirring music. Do you remember what the American band played at El Caney? A "Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," and with a cheer the American troops swarmed over the hill sweeping the Spaniards before them. Who can deny the charm there is in music? You may hear greatmilitary bands in YOUE HOME. An Edison Phonograph will bring them there. You may have a free trial no matter where you live.

On the back page you will find a detailed account of the wonderful Edison Phonograph. You can make no mistake if you buy this instrument.

G. H. J., Evansville, Minn.—Nothing will color the skin permanently unless it is some pigment introduced under the cuticle. Mere stain will grow off as the skin changes which it is constantly doing. (2) Specks before the eyes, when not the result of defective vision, are caused by a disordered stomach and liver. In one case, consult an oculist; in the other, diet yourself and take a dose of salts in hot water half an hour before breakfast.

before breakfast.

W. G. N., Topeka, Kans.—You are in a malarial condition and the best thing you can do is to take a trip off to the high lands of Colorado. Go out there and work for three months and you'll feel like a different man. Then come back to Kansas if you want to, though we think you won't. If you go, you may be worse for the first month, but that is only the malaria getting out of the system, and you will begin to pick up after that. In the mean time, if you have not been taking quinine, take about six or eight grains a day, and eat simple, wholesome food, and not much of it, and take a dose of salts, three times a week, before breakfast.

P. N. L., Middleboro, Mass.—Moles are not

P. N. L., Middleboro, Mass.—Moles are not to be removed except by experts skilled in the profession, and not always successfully, even by them. Moles are dangerous things to tamper with, and our advice is that you let them alone. Ask any physician in your town what he thinks about them. Ask any ph about them.

about them.

W. H., Muskegon, Mich.—Nobody can cure you but yourself. You have simply to exercise your own will power and the cure will be effected. Otherwise you will go to your grave a wreck. Nothing is the matter with you except your own foolish weakness, and you've got to brace up on your own resolution. Better not try the concerns you mention. One, we know, is not reliable. Take to the open air, bright company, lively associates, keep away from yourself and get a sweetheart to cheer you up and be your wife.

Distressed Reader, Howell, Ind.—One hair remedy is about as good as another, and the best will not make hair grow when the roots are dead. Might as well try to make teeth grow again, when they are pulled out. If you have lost your hair by disease, the drug store remedies will usually get it going again. They are as good as any you can make yourself, and better.

better.

A. J., Cadiz, Ill.—If you feel no ill effects from not perspiring freely, don't bother about it. You are all right. Nature is handling you on a different plan from most people, that's all.

P. P. N., Walhalla, N. Dak.—The changes of skin you mention are natural and as you are not inconvenienced except some as to your looks when your face gets red, you had better not try to improve on nature and make matters worse. As you look all right on fair days, and there are more fair days than foul in the Dakotas, you have no cause for complaint, or medical treatment.

A. Z., Rich Hill, Mo—You have we should.

ment.

A. Z., Rich Hill, Mo.—You have, we should say, catarrh of the stomach. You need a physician to treat that properly, but you can do most of the cure by careful dieting and getting your digestive organs to working right. At nineteen you should be able in a year or so to get into very fair shape, but it will take time and care. Eat sparingly and only such food as you can easily digest and drink no coffee. Eat very little meat, and that mostly lamb, and no pork. Eat bread toasted hard, and drink no water at meals, but plenty between. Uncooked cabbage, rice, eggs, milk with bread in it, fruits, no pastry, and such vegetables as cause no uneasiness after eating. You will have to make your own diet by trying out your food. Take salts, before breakfast in hot water, often enough to keep your bowels open. Now, go and see a doctor and tell him what we have to intention for the content of the cont

E. S. S. M., Buckner, Ark.—Malodorous perspiration is quite common and its cause is not definitely known. About the s.mplest remedy for it is to put a few drops of ammonia in the water you bathe in. Not in the water in which you wash your face, as it will affect the eyes. If applied daily or oftener it will destroy the odor at once. If you have a druggist near you he can supply you with ammonia especially prepared for such use.

such use.

E. D., Ellobelle, Ga.—We can't do anything for you except to advise you to go to Atlanta and consult a specialist. If you are not able to pay much he will not charge you much. Doctors are human, and that is why they charge high prices to those who can pay, and help those all they can, who are not able to pay. If you let the case continue, you never can be cured. We take it for granted that your physician's diagnosis was correct.

Neigh, New Mayville, Pa.—It is physiologically wrong for cousms to marry, just as it is for the inbreeding of any other stock. There may be many instances which are exceptions, but the violation of the law will bring its punishment in due time. bring its punishment in due time.

Old-time Subscriber, Collis, Minn.—Your trouble is indigestion. Your food is not digested and all the other trouble follows. First, diet yourself. See answer above to "A. Z., Rich Hill, Mo." on what to eat. In addition take after eating a half teaspoonful of cooking soda in a glass of water. You are giving your digestive organs more work than they can do and they are breaking down and taking the others with them. Sunflower, Kansas City, Kans.—Your complexion would improve if you got out into the sunshine oftener, and took the exercise prescribed by the physical culturists. Housework is one kind of exercise, but it is not the kind you need. (2) It is generally accepted that superfluous hair cannot be permanently removed except by electric treatment by a specialist. Depilatories, more or less injurious, will remove it temporarily only. One is about as effectual as another, including the plain shaving with a razor. ter chance you will have to get rid of it. Delays are dangerous.

G. R. W., White Earth, N. Dak.—Ordinary chloroform liniment, to be had at any drug store, is the best for sciatic and muscular rheumatism. Do not rub the parts affected, but moisten a piece of flannel with the liniment and hold it tightly over the affected part, covering the hand with another piece of cloth to keep the fumes in. As soon as it begins to get very hot let the air get to it, to prevent blistering. Be careful or you will blister yourself more than you like. A change of climate is of more benefit than all the medicine and you should go to the hot, dry climate of Arizona or New Mexico.

A. H. J., Kizer, Tenn.—The physician, if a good one, who made the examination is the only person competent to judge and what he says should be accepted as against a guess from one a thousand miles away. Put the case in the physician's hands and let him treat it properly if you want to get rid of the trouble, or at least, relieve it. If the patient is upwards of fifty, relief is about the best he can expect.

C. M. Z., Kenmare, N. Dak.—Press the blackheads out after steaming the face over a basin of boiling water, covering the head with a towel. Massage ten minutes with a cream made of express oil of sweet almonds, ninety minims, fresh cucumber juice, one ounce; lanoline, four drams; oil of rose, four drops. Melt the oil and lanoline in a double boiler; take from the fire and stir in the cucumber juice. Before the mixture cools add the perfume; beat until cool. Remove all the cream from the face with a soft towel, bathe in hot water and apply a lotion made as follows: Boracic acid, one dram; alcohol, one ounce; rosewater, two ounces. Each morning bathe the face in hot and cold water alternately, in the last cold water put a few drops of benzoin. Steam the face once a week only. If you are unable to make your own massage cream, that you can get at a drug store may be used.

F.B., Youngtown, N. Dak.—For discolorations of the skin use bichloride of mercury, Ruby, Pine Grove, Ill.—The re nose may be due to indigestion. Try dieting, and stop drinking coffee, if you drink it. Get plenty of fresh air and sunshine. Wear comfortable clothing and shoes. Take a cold bath every morning. Apply this lotion daily: tannic acid, iffteen grains; camphor water, five ounces.

grains; camphor water, five ounces.

Lucy, Hot Springs, Ark.—Vaucaire's developer is said to be the best. It is compounded as follows: Liquid extract of galega (goat's rue), ten grains; lacto-phosphate of lime, ten grams; tincture of fennel, ten grams; simple syrup, 400 grams. Dose two soupspoonfuls in water before each meal. Bathe the bust every morning in cold water. Also practice deep-breathing, every morning on arising. Inhale by the nose and exhale by the mouth. Take as long breaths as posible, and as many as ten, when you can do so many.

To Cure Consumption

Dissolve one grain of chlorate of potash in a cup of warm water. Dose, one half teaspoon-ful in a little water after meals. A. E. C.

Easy Way to Pick Ducks

Dry pick the first layer of feathers, and put the ducks into a pan and sprinkle them thoroughly with powdered rosin; then pour boiling water over them. The feathers will come off easily bringing the down with them. Duck picking has always been a problem, and a very great task; this is an old-fashioned way of doing but very effectual.

Apple Salad

Select apples of uniform size and scoop out center, heap the cavity with equal parts of chopped apple, celery and nuts, moistened with mayonnaise dressing, stick a sprig of celery into the top of each and serve on a lettuce leaf. If red apples are used the salad is especially attractive.

Grape Catsup

Five pounds of grapes, one pound sugar, one pint vinegar, one teaspoonful each of cloves, allspice, cinnamon, and salt. Tie spices in muslin bag (they should be whole). Cook grapes until soft then strain and add spices, etc., cook slowly until quite thick; bottle while hot. I put mine in glass jars same as any fruit and seal hot.

Chicken with Marcaroni

One half pound of macaroni boiled in water with a lump of butter for one quarter hour; drain off the water, then cover with milk; add salt and pepper and a whole onion stuck with four cloves, boil until the macaroni is tender. Boil a chicken in the usual way and when tender cut it up and lay it on a hot dish; pour the macaroni over it; remove the onion and grate cheese over the whole. Brown it in the oven and serve hot.

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT readers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions in this column. They will thus save time, labor and postiage. Letters reaching this office after the 25th of the month cannot be answered in the issue of the following month.

C. M. D., Easley, S. C.—Write to Mortimer Green, 26 East 24th St., or to Holcombe & Co., 18 East 28th St., New York City. If they do not handle, ask them to refer your letter to someone who does.

Mo. Boy, South West, Mo.—The best art schools are in the eastern cities, but as a beginning you might take a course from a correspondence school. That will at least give you a pretty good idea of what you will have to do before you can draw well enough to make a living at it. Your samples indicate that you have talent enough to improve it.

W. O. H., Callao, Mo.—There is not enough premium on half pennies to make it worth while unless you have a large number. Write to Editor, Numismatist, Monroe, Mich.

Soldier Boy, Macon, Tenn.—Apply for information concerning West Point to the Secretary of War, Washington, D. C., or better, to your Congressman. You will have to improve considerably in your writing, unless you are a much better fighter than writer. However, you spell all right. right.

A. M., Winsted, Conn.—As you do not state what kind of a lawyer, civil or criminal, you want, and our acquaintance is limited, we think it would be better for you to inquire of a lawyer in your own town for the address of some reliable man who is known to your informant. He will not charge you for the information.

Letters of Thanks

Dear Editor and Sisters:

I take this method to sincerely thank all who so kindly remembered me (a locomotor ataxia shut-in), by sending letters, cards and various kinds of reading matter. May God's richest blessing ever abide with each and everyone of them; although financially poor and in my sixtieth year, I want to always be on Comfort's subscription list.

If Miss Nannie Depper, formerly of Winston, Salem, N. C., should read this, she will please accept my sincere thanks for the box of stationery that she so kindly sent me Christmas. I mailed her a letter of thanks, which she never received, as the letter was returned to me. Again thanking each and everyone concerned for their kindness to me, and hoping I may receive more letters in the near future, I am your old cripple friend,

Comfort's Home Lawyer

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COM-FORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending fifteen (15) cents, in silver or stamps, for an annual subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S HOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail. Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

J. C. W.—We think that the Courts of your own State cannot obtain jurisdiction in the matter you mention without service of process upon the persons against whom you have the claim within the State, you might be able to reach that by attachment. Perhaps if you communicated with some reliable lawyer or collection agency in the State, where the people who owe you the money live, they might take an assignment of your claim and bring suit in the name of the assignee, but in case this was done and your debtor contested the suit it would be necessary for either you or someone else familiar with the goods to be present at the trial and testify as to their value, as otherwise your suit would fall for lack of proof; it is quite possible that they might settle the case without the necessity of a trial, if you placed your claim in the hands of a lawyer or collection agency in their vicinity and they thought you meant to proceed against them.

J. P. B.—We are of the opinion that your mother upon her death had a legal right to dispose of, by her will, such property as belonged to her individually, but that such as she had only a life estate in, or such as she had only in her physical possession but to which she had no legal title, she could not dispose of. We know of no way for you to recover the property, you say you own but which is in the possession of others, without bringing any legal proceedings, unless the persons who have possession of the property are willing to turn it over, to you voluntarily. The law does not operate of itself, but will wait until you either set it in operation or forfeit your rights by your own neglect.

Miss E. L. K.—Under the laws of the State from which you write, undue influence would be a ground, if fully established, to upset the validity of a will. The property of a decedent is divided according to the terms of their last valid will, but, if they leave no valid

Reuben T.—An examination of the charter of the min-ing company you mention would be necessary for us to tell whether the stock is assessable or not; unless other-wise provided for in the charter, we think perhaps the stock can be assessed.

stock can be assessed.

C. H.—We are of the opinion, that the man you mention could not be tried a second time after his acquittal upon the first trial for the crime you mention. The fundamental reasons why this is so would be too exhaustive a subject for us to go into in this column; we do not undertake to explain the reasons for the enactment of the various laws, but simply to give our opinion on the construction of the various laws as we find them in force.

(2) We do not think so. In some States the property and educational qualifications practically disfranchise them.

(2) We do not think so. In some States the property and educational qualifications practically disfranchise them.

Rose.—There are a number of ways in which the two brothers you mention can adjust and divide the partnership property they own. You have not in your communication to us made the details of the plan of settlement you mention quite plain enough for us to understand, and we think that as the matter is a very important one a lawyer should be employed to draw the necessary papers, as it is very important, that in all matters pertaining to real estate the greatest caution should be exercised in order to keep the title to the property clear of any defect. We do not see how the wife of the one brother can take any action in the matter; he should be the one to act himself and should for his children's sake try to have the matter straightened out.

J. W.—We are of the opinion, that the funeral expenses of the man who died is a valid claim against his estate, and could be collected from his estate. If, as we understand from your letter, this claim was not paid, we think the undertaker had a legal right to impress his claim upon the real estate of the decedent and have the same sold, and the heirs of the estate would be powerless to defeat the collection of his claim, unless, of course, there was some irregularity in the legal proceedings he may have taken to enforce his claim. Just claims against a decedent's estate are legally preferred before the rights of an heir to the property of the estate.

W. A. B.—Under the laws of the State you mention, we are of the opinion that the real estate provided it was of an heir to the property of the estate.

W. A. B.—Under the laws of the State you mention, we are of the opinion that the real estate, provided it was not inherited from the father, belonging to the child you mention would, upon the death of the child, you the mother to the exclusion of the brother or sisters of the half-blood, except, of course, unless a different disposition was made of the property by the child's will, or in case he or she left descendants, in which case they would inherit the property.

J. V.—We do not think you can recover the money you paid your friend, although he may have made himself liable to punishment for his act.

B. J. F.—As near as we can understand from your paid your friend, although he may have made himself liable to punishment for his act.

B. J. F.—As near as we can understand from your statements, we think it is very doubtful if the mortgage you executed is a valid one, but we think it wiser for you to pay than to dispute the judgment of it, as, from your statement to us, we fear you have made yourself liable to serious criminal prosecution.

Mrs. G. M.—Under the laws of the State you mention, we are of the opinion, that, if the real estate is owned by the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety, upon the death of one the whole property goes to the survivor absolutely; (2) that a will, if legally executed, no matter where made is good. (3) We do not think that any written document is necessary to convey title to the article of jurniture you mention, provided immediate possession is taken of the same. (4) We think that, if the man you mention should reside in the State you mention at the time of his death, and should leave no will, his widow would receive from his personal estate one third, if there be also issue, and if there be no issue, one half and from his real estate the income on one third for life if there be issue, and if there be no issue, one half for life. This last, of course, does not apply to such real property as they hold, as you say jointly, but what we, in legal phraseology, call as tenants by the entirety, as such property does not go into and form any part of his estate, as it is vested before death in the survivor of the husband and wife.

M. J. L. and W. B.—To claim money and to legally substantiate the claim are two different things; we do not husband and wife.

M. J. L. and W. B.—To claim money and to legally substantiate the claim are two different things; we do not think that, if the man you mention should properly defend any action his brothers or sisters should bring against him for the money his father paid him for taking care of him, they could collect anything from him, but we see no way to prohibit their claiming they are entitled to some of it. In case they should bring an action against him for any of this money, he should defend the action.

Wherever you live I can refer you to well known ladies of your own state or county who know and will glady tell any sufferer that this Home Treatment really cures all diseased conditions of our delicate female organism, thoroughly strengthens relaxed muscles and ligaments which cause displacement and against him for any of this money, he should defend the action.

preciate your kind expressions of sympathy. I haven't walked in thirteen long weary years. Rheumatism is the cause of my affliction. My life is sometimes very lonely. I would be glad to be remembered in any way on Aug. 9. I am twenty-seven years old.

MISS VIRILLA SEVANN, Sprott, R. F. D., 2, Ala. Ala.

DEAR SISTERS :

DEAR SISTERS:

I enjoy this corner and have often wished I could be of some help to you all. Now I have a chance, as I have cured my little boy of of enlarged tonsils, with a very simple remedy. He suffered greatly from asthmatic breathing, and at one time we had grave fears for the future.

As I have lost six of my eight dear children, and pity all these helpless little sufferers, I will gladly answer all mothers who write and inclose a stamped self-addressed envelope.

I have nothing to sell, but cannot afford to pay postage on all letters.

At present I am a shut-in, and would be pleased to receive letters from different parts of the country.

Comforting Hints of All Sorts

To prevent thin material being dragged by the sewing machine put a strip of thickish paper under it. When sewn this will easily tear awy.

White spots may be removed from varnished furniture by the use of a polish of alcohol, olive oil and cider vinegar.

When boiling eggs put on the lid of the sauce in and the eggs will have a much finer flavor.

Bags for Brooms

A string should be run in each and tied around the handle of the broom. Thus covered the broom will be found very useful in wiping down walls, high windows and also polished floors. The bags may be easily washed out and dried before us Linen is often used for these covers but is not equal to flannelette.

The tall vase so adapted for long-stemmed flowers has one deplorable defect; it is certain to be top heavy, and when you least expect it, over it topples and disaster follows. Fill the bottom of the vase with about two inches of shot and you will have no more trouble.

Make Money Printing Cards.

About all boys have an ambition to learn a trade that will give honest employment and mental improvement. With our handy Printing Outfit a boy or girl can accomplish the art of type setting as well as printing, thus conquering two subjects at one time. These complete outfits consist of a six-font set of rubber type; that is, there are six of each of most all the letters in the alphabet except some important letters have eight, and others only four, such as "Q," A double set of numerals, commas, periods, and four handsome ornaments; also slugs or spaces to separate words—in all about 200 separate pieces of type. A two-line type holder for printing cards, etc. It works like a miniature Franklin printing press, so you can print cards for your friends and thus make money. A pair of nickeled pincers to handle type and a metal case ink pad. This ink pad is everlasting and can be renewed if constant use removes the ink. With each set we send a wooden type case so that type can be arranged and kept in perfect order, also full and complete instructions how to set type, etc. A wonderful outfit for printing cards or small amount of text. Will afford amusement and instruction unbounded. Every child will appreciate one and grown folks can make use of these ests for marking linen by procuring an indelible ink pad. It is probable such an outfit as we offer can not be found everywhere and we expect to give away a great many for the slight work done in getting subscriptions for us.

CLUB OFFER, For a club of only 3 yearly subscribers at 15 cents each, 45 cents in all, we will end you postpaid one of these Printing Outfits all complete as described.

Our fifty-card Album is the most attractive on the market. On each page two cards may be displayed; the leaves are very heavy rigid paper stock of a heavy green shade, providing a very tasty and attractive background for all cards, and when two pages are opened together showing four cards, the appearance is extremely attractive, and one cannot neatly preserve a collection of Post Cards unless they are displayed in an Album. And better still, a very nice collection of Souvenir Postal Cards represents the individual and personal thought of absent or distant relatives and friends and they are very entertaining for visitors who enjoy looking them over; so, that in an Album, arranged in order, they are readily accessible and may be examined time after time with no harm to the Cards, and thus preserved in remembrance of the senders. No one thinks of collecting Souvenir Cards without an Album. Everyone wants an Album and the demand, just now, exceeds the supply. We are fortunate in having a great quantity on hand of first-class Albums which we are to distribute as premiums to those who will send us clubs of subscribers to this magazine as per our offer below.

Club Offers Soribers to this paper at 15 cents each, we will send an Album free and will include a set of four Post Cards free, as a beginning towards filling the Album.

To wash silk handkerchiefs begin by soaping well and using cold water; then rinse and let dry. Boil a handful of bran in water, strain through a linen cloth, and then steep the handkerchiefs in it for some time; press and hang out to dry; iron while still damp.

To keep bread and butter fresh and moist, put it in a cool place, cover closely with a cloth wrung out of cold water, and many hours after it will be as moist as when cut.

Nothing baked well will keep well unless it is thoroughly cooled before being put away.

Oilcloth or linoleum will look much brighter if two tablespoonfuls of paraffine oil be put in the water it is washed with. No soap is necessary with this.

To clean a kettle, fill up with potato parings and then boil fast until clean.

For washing varnished walls a little melted glue put in the water is a great improvement. A dish or plate of water set in the oven when baking cake will prevent the edges scorching.

Use hot soda water for washing anything that is greasy. The alkali turns the grease into soap which will do its own cleansing.

Good Old Songs We All Love

By special request from many of our readers we print the words of a few songs and will continue to do so each month as space allows. We invite our readers to send in the words of popular old songs which they think would please our six millions of readers. In copying, give each line of poetry a line by itself, do not run it in, as though solid. Please write on one side of paper only.

Ever of Thee

Ever of thee I'm fondly dreaming,
Thy gentle voice my spirit can cheer,
Thou art the star that mildly beaming Shone o'er my path when all was dark and drear;

Still in my heart thy form I cherish, Every kind tho't like a bird flies to thee, Ah! never till life and mem'ry perish, Can I forget how dear thou art to me.

CHORUS.

Morn, noon and night where'er I may be Fondly I'm dreaming ever of thee. Fondly I'm dreaming ever of thee.

Ever of thee when sad and lonely,
Wandering afar my soul joyed to dwell,
Ah! then I felt I loved thee only,
All seemed to fade before affection's spell.
Years have not chilled the love I cherish,
True as the stars has my heart been to thee,
Ah! never till life and mem'ry perish
Can I forget how dear thou art to me.

CHORUS.

Little Boy Blue

The little toy dog is covered with dust,
But sturdy and staunch he stands,
And the little toy soldier is red with rust,
And the musket moulds in his hands.
Time was when the little toy dog was new,
And the soldier was passing fair,
And that was the time when our little Boy Blue Kissed them and put them there.

"Now don't you go till I come," he said,
"And don't you make any noise."
So troddling off to his trundle-bed,
He dreamed of the pretty toys,
And as he was dreaming, an angel song
Awakened our little Boy Blue.
Oh, the years are many, the years are long,
But the little toy friends are true.

Ah, faithful to little Boy Blue they stand,
Each in the same old place,
Awaiting the touch of a little hand,
The smile of a little face;
And they wonder, as waiting these long years through,
In the dust of that little chair,
What has become of our little Boy Blue
Since he kissed them and put them there.
—Eugene Field.

Just a little sunshine everywhere we go, Over darkened pathways rays of blessings throw; Golden rays of gladness from a loving heart Help the world to brighten; let us do our part.

Lots of Fun with an Edison Phonograph

This wonderful instrument has been termed, and rightly. too, the "king of entertainers". There is absolutely no one old or young who is not amused and delighted by this greatest invention of the "WIZARD OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY". As Mr. Edison has well said, no American Home should be without a phonograph.

Look at the happy home scene depicted above, very moment there are thousands of homes in th States where you might find just such scenes as these.

The baby, as you see, is filled with delight at the deep, human sounds which come from the big horn of the phonograph. Grandpa is as much pleased as the baby. Every member of the family is happy. Don't you want to bring just member of the family is happy. such scenes into your own home?

There are 1,500 Edison Records. Think of it: Fifteen hundred different 'acts' which may be given on an Edison. The greatest planist in the world doesn't know 1,500 pieces.

Think of the many delightful programmes you could make up. Let us suppose you want to have a dance. Place the phonograph in one end of the room, take up the carpets or rugs and begin. You don't have to wait for any fiddler and you don't have to pay him $3 for his work either.

Here is an illustration of what you may do when your friends call: One likes a comic song. Out comes a record filled by one of the best known minstrels of the day. Everybody applauds, and while the hand clapping is going on you slip in a Sousa march and watch the listeners straighten up. Another asks for a dialog between two "culud gem'n," some one else wants one of Melba's selections, and still another wants a ringing "Cohan" tune. The applause becomes deafening and you are the hero or the heroine of the whole neighborhood. Thus can the concerts go on night after night. Any boy or girl can learn in five minutes how to play

And on Sunday you may have sacred music of the very ghest quality.

> And don't forget that you may secure records of every member of the family. These will keep for years and years, and after the dear ones have departed their voices will be with you still. Let Grandpa talk into the horn and then listen to his exact words as they come from the phonograph a moment later. Let the baby talk into the horn and the same miracle plainly with pencil or pen and lnk on this Free Coupon, clip or tear it out, place it in an envelope and mall it to us. You will receive free by return mail our beautiful Edison catalog and circular mail our beautiful Edison Phonographs. You may take any outfit on a trial. Write today. Don't delay, Remember—you pay nothing for a Free Trial, and if you do not want the instrument after you have given it a 48 hours' trial in your home you may return it at our expense. You do not have to pay one cent down, you do not have to make a guarantee and we charge no C.O.D.—Be the first in your town—write right now.
